Netanyahu has ruled out territorial compromise on the Golan Heights, saying that its future is "absolutely not" negotiable. In addition, he has refused to honor oral understandings reportedly reached by the previous government and has insisted that both sides should approach the problem without "preconditions."

For its part, Syria has asserted that the talks can only resume from the point where they left off and must be based on the unwritten Israeli assurances conveyed to Damascus via the United States in 1995.

According to reports, confirmed by Netanyahu but denied by Israel's former ambassador to the United States, Yitzhak Rabin made a conditional promise to Clinton that Israel would withdraw from the Golan, to the June 4, 1967 borders, in exchange for a full-blown peace treaty with acceptable security arrangements and provisions for normalization.

Not being amenable to these "hypothetical" terms, Netanyahu has said that Israel and Syria are free to raise whatever demands they want.

Syria, in turn, has accused Israel of backing away from Rabin's apparent promises, and said that talks can only be renewed on the basis of the land-for peace formula, as found in United Nations Security Council Resolution 242.

Levy has embraced 242, but Netanyahu has not explicitly stated that it should form the keystone of talks with Syria. Perhaps a "bridging" formula can be devised in Washington when Netanyahu confers with Clinton.

THE ARK

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR POSITION

The Ark, a nationally recognized Jewish social service agency headquartered in Chicago, seeks an executive director. The incumbent is responsible for program management/development, staff recruitment/supervision, and represents The Ark in the Chicago Jewish and professional communities. The executive director supervises a staff of 40+ professionals, oversees a budget in excess of $3 million, assists with fundraising, grant-writing and staff and board development.

The Ark has served the Jewish community for over 25 years, providing a variety of services to the poor free of charge. Services include medical, dental, pharmaceutical, transitional housing, a kosher food pantry, legal assistance, holiday programming, mental health counseling and direct cash assistance. Most of these services are provided with the assistance of over 400 active volunteers. All programs and services are delivered in a distinctly Jewish context.

The executive director must have strong leadership qualities, demonstrated managerial and administrative skills, and experience working closely with lay leadership. Experience in Jewish communal service and professional degree required. We offer competitive salary and benefits.

Resumes only (no phone calls please!) to
Chicago, IL 60602.

The Jewish Theological Seminary/ The Jewish Theological Society of Canada

The Jewish Theological Seminary, located in New York, was founded more than a century ago and today is a learning community of some 100 faculty and 1,000 students. Beginning as a rabbinical school, the Seminary today also includes an undergraduate college, a cantorial school, and a graduate school which grants advanced degrees across the entire spectrum of Jewish Studies. In September 1996, it opened its fifth school, the William Davidson Graduate School of Jewish Education

The Jewish Theological Seminary invites applications for:

DIRECTOR OF ITS CANADIAN OFFICE

The Director is responsible for all of the fundraising in Canada on behalf of the Seminary. The principal focus is Toronto where the office is located. He or she will be responsible for planning and implementing the annual giving campaign, as well as for soliciting endowments and capital gifts, and education and cultivation of lay leadership. We seek a creative, energetic person with strong interpersonal and organizational skills. Knowledge of Conservative Judaism very helpful, as is familiarity with Canadian Jewish institutions. Preferred: 3 to 5 years fundraising experience, but will consider entry level professionals, as well. Salary: commensurate with experience.

Please send resumes with salary history to Rabbi Roy I. Rosenbaum, Vice-President for Development, Jewish Theological Seminary, 3080 Broadway, Suite 400, New York, NY 10027. Fax (212) 678-8941. No phone calls, please.

Media inaccurate in portraying Israel

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

The author, second from the left, and a number of Canadian rabbinic colleagues "learning a page of economics" during their recent visit to Israel. Standing to the left of Rabbi Bulka are Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz, Rabbi Louis Schechter, Joel Rabinowitz of Bank Hapoalim, Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, Rabbi Martin Berman, Rabbi Roy Tannenbaum, and Rabbi Barry Schneider. At the far left and right of the group are bank officials.

If you form your opinion of reality based on what you read in the papers, hear on the radio or see on the television, or all of the above, then you are no doubt convinced that Israel is an unsafe place in which to live, that it is an unsafe place to visit and that the country is on the verge of falling apart at the seams.

The reason you may feel this way is that all you hear about are the protracted difficulties with the peace process, the ugly assaults on people, including the horrible bus bombings in Tel Aviv and the attacks in Hebron, and the ongoing stories of internal squabbles between the religious and secular communities in Israel.

However, there is another reality to Israel. It is the reality of Israel as we directly experience it, not by what we hear or by what we read or by what we see.

I recently returned from my latest visit to Israel and I am pleased to be able to report that the reality is far from the picture you may have formulated in your mind. I was in Israel when the machine gun fire was unleashed on Arabs in the Hebron market. This could have been a massacre, but thanks to the quick reaction of the IDF, the damage was kept in check. Six people were injured. Hopefully they will recover; thankfully there were no fatalities.

Perhaps because there were no fatalities, there was little backlash or polarizing invective.

The immediate purpose of my visit to Israel was to take part in the annual conference of the State of Israel Bonds Rabbinic Cabinet. During this conference, we visited many places. We visited Katzrin, on the Golan Heights, where we heard the rabbi speak about the communities of the Golan. He emphasized with pride that the religious and the secular in the Golan get along well and cooperate with one another.

On the trek back to Jerusalem from the Golan, we stopped off in Migdal HaEmek. There we heard the community's mayor, Likud MK Shaul Amor, speak about the positive interaction between the religious and the non-religious.

Then we went on to a moshav called Shadmot Mechola, where we also heard about the great rapport between the divergent communities in the area.

Now comes the obvious question. If everyone gets along so well, where is this much-trumpeted religious-secular conflict?

It is indeed in some places, but it is certainly not everywhere. We who are so vulnerable to being "brainwashed" by the press are convinced that Israel is a society slowly being torn apart by the internal bickering and destructive strife of the religious-secular variety.

The truth is: It is simply not so. There are definite flashpoints; there are pronounced differences; but there is also a massive amount of good feeling, good intention, genuine dialogue and true caring, that transcend any ideological borders. But we do not hear this, because the media, for reasons known only to them, choose to accentuate the negative rather to promote the positive.

I am not living in a fool's paradise. I do not delude myself into thinking that everything is rosy in Israel. We do have serious challenges, including the challenge of mending the bridge between the religious and the secular communities. Israel needs much healing and coming together, a process that was definitely accelerated following the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. There is much that has to be done. But there is an overwhelming amount of goodwill, and a sincere desire to come together.

Religious and secular have gotten together for soul searching, for study sessions and for dialogue. People who are in the field of education in Israel are sensitive to the need for coming together and are working to address this issue. There are many forces for reconciliation and for coming together. Given the opportunity, Israel will overcome this great challenge to its internal vibrancy.

And there is also a recognition that we are in this together, that we must together to work our way out of the quagmire. Yes, there are extremists on both sides of the spectrum. But in reality, they represent a very small percentage of Israeli society and a very large percentage of the news copy. They make the loudest noises; they do things that make the news and sell the news; but they do not represent the country.

In the broad base between the extremes, there is a solid consensus on many things, including the march toward peace with the Palestinians and the march towards harmony with fellow Jews.

We dare not let this march be impeded by an irresponsible media that desires to paint a negative picture because it suits their needs. And we dare not let the extremists on either side steal the agenda and be allowed to foist their nonsense on a country and a people that genuinely yearn for peace and harmony.

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

New Baycrest program offers short-term hospital stay for frail elderly

TORONTO — A new program at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Geriatric Assessment and Treatment Unit (GATU), offers help to the frail elderly who find it difficult to live on their own.

The program offers a short-term stay in hospital where patients have access to a variety of medical, rehabilitative and social services. It is also accessible to those in long-term care institutions.

"Sometimes after receiving previous treatment for an acute incident, elderly people experience a noticeable decline, instead of steady improvement," says Dr. Shelley Sternberg, GTAU's interim coordinator. "The person may have trouble with dressing or bathing, may not be eating as well as normally or may appear depressed. The goal of our program is to determine the reasons for the decline and to help the client achieve a higher level of functioning."

GATU is designed for those who may have non-acute, complex medical problems or mild to moderate cognitive impairment. The unit offers two features — a team approach and an in-hospital stay — which are particularly helpful to the elderly in this situation.

"Clients in our unit are assessed and treated by a number of health care professionals, each with a special area of expertise," says Sternberg.

The in-hospital stay of up to four weeks is also of benefit to elderly people who are too frail to make several trips to hospital for assessment and treatment.

Following their stay, most return to the community, with the appropriate support services in place. Patients who need more care can be admitted to the unit's reactivation program which offers the same type of treatment over a longer time period.

People interested in applying for admission to GATU, either for themselves or a family member, should talk first to their family physician. They may also contact Baycrest's Community Outreach Team at 416-785-2488, whose staff of professionals visit older people in their homes to conduct initial assessments.

Women of distinction award goes to two Weizmann Institute scientists

REHOVOT – Two researchers from Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science have been honored for their work that led to the development of a new drug to help people with multiple sclerosis (MS).

Prof. Ruth Arnon and Dr. Dvora Teitelbaum received the first Women of Distinction Awards from Hadassah-WIZO.

The honor was bestowed upon them and on four other outstanding Israeli women at a ceremony in the Knesset on Jan. 26.

Arnon and Teitelbaum were recognized for synthesizing and developing — together with former president of the Weizmann Institute, Prof. Michael Sela — the MS drug called copolymer-1 (Copaxone(r)).

In December 1996, the drug received approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. It is manufactured and marketed by Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd., which further developed the drug with the participation of physicians and researchers from Israel and other countries.

The scientific work that resulted in the development of copolymer-1 began with a disappointment. In trying to produce an MS-like disease in laboratory animals, the scientists synthesized several protein-like molecules called copolymers that mimicked a natural substance believed to trigger MS. But despite repeated efforts, the new molecules failed to produce the disease.

The scientists persisted, and in studying the properties of their copolymers, they stumbled upon an amazing discovery. Rather than triggering MS-like symptoms, the molecules actually blocked them. The researchers realized that they were seeing the potential for a new drug.

Years of research and several clinical trials later, one of the molecules, copolymer-1, indeed proved effective in alleviating the symptoms of relapsing-remitting MS in human patients. MS, which affects at least one million people worldwide, is an auto-immune disorder in which the immune system mistakenly attacks and destroys the protective coating of nerves, leading to symptoms ranging from numbness to paralysis.

"By talking to patients and their physicians, we knew long before the large clinical trials had been completed that we were on the right track," says Teitelbaum.

"It's hard to describe the wonderful feeling of satisfaction that comes from the realization that our work is bringing someone relief," adds Arnon.

But she and her colleagues are not about to rest on their laurels, she says, adding that they hope to apply what they learned from their research on copolymer-1 to finding remedies for other auto-immune disorders.

"And meanwhile, as an Israeli," she says, "I am really proud that Copaxone, which will bring relief to MS sufferers all over the world, is a true 'sabra,'a born-in-Israel product."

The Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel has 2,400 scientists, students and support staff engaged in more than 850 research projects across the spectrum of contemporary science.

Helping Children

CHILDREN OF CHERNOBYL

When the nuclear reactor in Chernobyl, a city in Ukraine, exploded in April 1986, the radiation that leaked out made many people sick and contaminated food sources for miles around. People were especially worried about their children, who, because they are smaller, are more likely to be harmed by the radiation.

Chabad's Children of Chernobyl project has been taking children from that area by plane to Israel ever since the explosion. The children have received medical treatment, psychological care and a change of scene from the troubles at home. Many now live in Israel.

This picture shows some children arriving in Israel on the Children of Chernobyl's latest rescue mission. They are accompanied by Yossie Raichik, director of the program, who flew with the children from Kiev in Ukraine.

So far, over 1,400 children have come to Israel with the organization's help. Chabad hopes to evacuate another 150 children by this spring. [Mickey Freiden photo]

Bat Mitzvah important milestone for girls

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Until very recently, Jewish families seemed to make a big fuss about boys becoming bar mitzvah. Boys had the ceremony at shul, the big party and lots of presents.

People seemed to forget that the bar mitzvah had a very important meaning — that the boy had reached the age where he was expected to assume all the responsibilities of a grown-up Jew.

What they also forgot was that Jewish girls reached that same stage, and that the age of bat mitzvah was just as important a milestone for them as it was for boys.

Barbara Diamond Goldin has written a very interesting book about this, called Bat Mitzvah; a Jewish Girl's Coming of Age (Viking, 1995).

The first girl to formally celebrate her bat mitzvah was Judith Kaplan, whose father, Rabbi Mordechai Kaplan, founded the Reconstructionist movement. Since then, girls belonging to the Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist branches of Judaism have begun to read from the Torah and have much the same kind of celebration as their brothers do.

While Orthodox girls do not have the same kind of ceremony, in the last few years they too have begun to mark the occasion in very special ways. If they daven in a women's minyan, as Goldin explains, they may also read from the Torah and lead services.

Bat Mitzvah has several chapters giving suggestions for ways different girls have marked their coming of age, such as giving some of their gifts to tzedakah, making a tallit, or painting a picture representing part of the Torah portion. Some go to Israel. One girl had her bat mitzvah in Kai-Feng, in China, in what used to be a Jewish community.

The first part of the book is a fascinating history of Jewish women, including those in the Bible, what things were like in the Middle Ages, and the changing role in women in religious and communal life in North America.

For girls (and their parents) who don't spend much time ordinarily in the synagogue, Goldin explains clearly just what will happen during the bat mitzvah service.

Bat Mitzvah, a Jewish Girl's Coming of Age not only gives the facts about bat mitzvah, but also gives those celebrating a bat mitzvah inspiration and encouragement.

New diet program helps the overweight

People battling the bulge are getting help from a new diet program available through a network of well-established physicians practicing in the Greater Toronto Area. Med Weight Control Systems (Med Weight) officially launched in four medical offices last week.

Med Weight is based on a program out of Florida's University Medical Center, run by Dr. Larry Gilderman. One of its specialties is the care and treatment of overeating. Says Dr. Gilderman, "In my 23 years of medical practice, I looked at many weight loss programs. This one works. There are minimal, if any, side effects. The success rate, based on reaching goal weight, is high — about 75% — providing the patient keeps on the program."

General Manager for Med Weight, Neil Lang, says, "Our program was adapted for Canadians by Canadians. For example, we hired nutritionists to modify the reduced-calorie menus, including vegetarian and Kosher, to meet Health Canada's Recommended Daily Intake and follow Canada's Food Guide."

Lang adds, "Med Weight is grounded on an overall philosophy of medical supervision, nutrition counselling, lifestyle management and moderate exercise."

The 15-week program uses the new diet drugs everyone's talking about, in combination with a 3-day (1,000-calorie) restricted diet, and a 4-day (1,200-calorie) "free" diet you design yourself, according to your food preferences, with nutritionists. Most importantly, Med Weight offers personalized guidance and ongoing care, especially where the medications and lifestyle changes are concerned.

Dr. Gilderman emphasizes, "But let me make one thing clear ... this is not a weight loss program for everybody. Because prescription medications are used, this is not a vanity program. It is recommended for people ≥30% overweight, or ≥20% if they have risk factors such as high blood pressure, diabetes, high cholesterol or arthritis. We do not want people self-medicating themselves. Initially, a full work-up is done on a patient to determine if they are candidates for it, then the patient's condition is continually assessed while on the medications."

It is important to help people with not only the "what" to eat, but "how" to eat. Lang says, "People need help with motivation. That's where we come in — providing private, individual support during weight loss and management."

Lang concludes , "We feel good about our future. We're associating with the best physicians, the brightest staff, and multiple professional service offerings ... with plans for many more. For our patients, it's a "win" on the way to weight loss."

THIS IS NOT A WEIGHT LOSS PROGRAM FOR EVERYBODY. (Is it for you?)

YOU	WE
• Committed to losing weight • Need help staying motivated • Driven to modify eating habits • Know you need to lose weight Is this you?	• Community network of established physicians • Medically-supervised weight control program • Medication partnered with reduced-calorie menus • Personal counselling by a nutritionist

 Vegetarian and Kosher menus available.

Singles Registry Has Moved To New Headquarters

After 4 1/2 years in the B'nai Brith Building, the Jewish Singles Registry (Toronto's largest Jewish dating service) is happy to announce that it has expanded its operations, and moved into new headquarters at 55 Eglinton Ave. E., Ste. #405 on February 2, 1997. The J.S.R. office is situated 1 block east of Yonge St. and is easily accessible by subway, with public parking just walking distance away.

MEMBERS BENEFIT

Members will immediately notice many changes from the moment they walk through the door. The new office is virtually triple the size, offering a much larger waiting area, individual offices for Registry staff, and private viewing rooms for members, when they come in to select or view other registrants.

NEW COMPUTER SYSTEM

Finishing touches are now underway as the J.S.R. is proud to unveil its new "member operated" computer system. Beginning this month members will receive a 4-digit private security pass-code, which along with their membership number, will allow them easy access from the new office, into the J.S.R. data base of members. Members profiles and photographs have already been entered and are now ready for view.

VOICE PERSONAL MESSAGES

Perhaps the most exciting feature to be added to the system is voice personal messages. Not only will J.S.R. members be able to view someone's profile and see their photograph, but now at a touch of a button, they will be able to hear a 30 second voice personal message.

ADVERTISEMENTS/CLASSIFIEDS

Another feature that members can take advantage of is viewing or placing advertisements and/or classified ads for all other J.S.R. members to see. Whether one is selling an item or promoting a business or service here is a chance to let everybody know. Each classified ad or advertisement, allows one to write a brief description of the item or service for members to read, place a photograph or business card for members to see, and have up to 30 seconds to record a voice message for members to hear. While there is no charge for J.S.R. members to access the ads there is a nominal fee to place an ad. ANYONE IN THE GENERAL PUBLIC THAT WISHES TO PLACE AN AD, MAY DO SO AS WELL FOR A NOMINAL FEE. With over 1,250 members registered there is no better way to reach such a dynamic market of Jewish singles than through the J.S.R. Ad System. For more information please contact the J.S.R. office.

ANOTHER ENGAGEMENT

The J.S.R. is happy to report that still another couple has recently announced their engagement. Both working professionals, they met almost a year ago and connected immediately. In fact the J.S.R. concept has been so successful that the service is averaging an engagement every 6 weeks. Hundreds of dates are arranged monthly, with thousands of selections made each year. So whether you are looking to meet someone for friendship, a long term relationship, or something in between, the Jewish Singles Registry has someone right for you. Come in and see for yourself. Call us today at 416-483-4151. E-Mail at jsreg@accent.net.

Telrad sells 20 percent stake

CJN Staff and Wire Services

TEL AVIV — Northern Telecom, based in Brampton, Ont., last week acquired 20 percent of Telrad Telecommunications and Electronics Ltd., Israel's largest telecommunications equipment maker. The purchase price was $45 million (US).

Telrad, which is majority-owned by Koors Industries Ltd., said the deal will strengthen its growth and development, and enhance its ability to supply world-class telecommunications systems to its customers.

Telrad will launch a public equity offering in the near future, said Koors president and CEO Benjamin Gaon.

Founded in 1951, Telrad employs 2,600 workers and had a $400 million profit last year.

Northern Telecom employs some 68,000 people worldwide and posted $12 billion in revenues last year.

Speaking at the official signing here last week, Nortel president and CEO Jean Monty said Telrad's engineering and research capabilities were major factors in his company's decision to enter the deal.

Monty added that the recent accord on Hebron sealed the agreement.

He said the telecommunications system market is estimated at $200 billion worldwide, and is growing at 10 to 12 percent a year. "We want to globalize and expand," he said.

The deal, which covers five major areas, is the latest in joint Israeli-Canadian ventures in the hi-tech and telecommunications fields.

1947 film gets special screening

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Gentleman's Agreement caused quite a sensation when it was released in 1947. Elia Kazan's Academy Award-winning film about anti-Semitism in America, based on Laura Hobson's novel, pulled no punches, jolting unsuspecting viewers with its candor.

The movie, featuring an all-star cast headed by Gregory Peck and a compelling script by Moss Hart, will be screened by the Jewish Film Society on Feb. 9 at 7:30 p.m., at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Surprisingly enough, Gentleman's Agreement is not dated. Anti-Semitism in the United States today is not as crassly obtrusive as it was in the 1940s, but it is still as insidious.

The fast-talking editor of a national magazine assigns topnotch journalist Skyler (Phil) Green to write a series of articles about the persistence of anti-Semitism. He (Albert Dekker) wants Green (Peck) "to break it wide open."

At first, Green is unenthusiastic since it's really an old story and he can't think of a fresh angle. And one of the editor's Jewish friends tries to talk him out of it, claiming that anti-Semitism can't be written out of existence.

Green is on the verge of giving up when he is inspired by a brainwave. He'll pose as a Jew and expose "that awful thing," as his well-bred girlfriend, Kathy (Dorothy McGuire), indignantly describes anti-Semitism.

In short order, in a succession of well-crafted scenes, Green discovers that it is deep-seated and pervasive.

Green learns that his secretary (June Havoc) anglicized her Jewish-sounding name to avoid the sting of anti-Semitism; that his doctor is prejudiced; that Kathy herself is ambivalent about Jews; that the magazine's personnel manager discriminates against minorities; and that his own son's friends dislike Jews.

Green, a guileless exemplar of decency, is disgusted when his boyhood friend (John Garfield), an army officer, is insulted in a restaurant and rejected by an anti-Jewish landlord. Green broadens his education when he discovers that a posh resort he plans to check into is restrictive. Virtually the only person who's not anti-Semitic, overtly or subliminally, is the magazine's fashion editor (Celeste Holm, who won the Oscar for best supporting actress).

Ever didactic, Gentleman's Agreement invokes several themes. Anti-Semitism is tolerated by too many "nice people." Anti-Semitism is a festering sore on the body of American democracy. People should learn to live together. There is no such thing as a "Jewish type."

Fifty years on, these admonitions ring true. To a large degree, Gentleman's Agreement is as relevant in 1997 as it was in 1947.

New book chronicles Reichmann family, fortune

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — As Brooklyn-based author Anthony Bianco chronicles in his new 800-page biography The Reichmanns: Family, Faith, Fortune and The Empire of Olympia & York (Random House, $39.95), the spectacular rise and fall of the Reichmanns' $10-billion business dynasty within a single generation seem not to have fundamentally changed this "family of elect destiny" — at least not outwardly.

"Albert, Paul and Ralph and their wives continue to reside in the same houses in which they have lived since the 1960s," Bianco writes, "and to practise their faith in the same synagogues as do humble rank-and-file members of the ultra-Orthodox community that once revolved around them. In most families, the loss of a $10 billion fortune might have been expected to raise an embarrassing ruckus of accusation and recrimination, but the Reichmanns have all maintained a decorous silence, nursing their grievances privately while continuing to honor the requirements of family as conscientiously as they practise their religion."

Having attained unprecedented access to family members — including the highly reclusive Paul, who rightfully emerges as "one of the most resilient and tenacious entrepreneurs of the 20th century" — Bianco's work is unmatched in its level of detail of both business and family matters. Encyclopedically researched, it is a sparkling, privileged account by a writer capable of assessing situations and personalities with a keen and judicious eye.

A staff writer at Business Week magazine, the fiduciarily-astute Bianco took a four-year sabbatical in order to write the book. A Catholic, he displays a thorough knowledge of the principles of Jewish Orthodoxy that have governed the conduct of his subjects, even as they ventured ever further into the material world. He also relates much important (and hitherto untold) history concerning Toronto's Orthodox community, which, in large part due to the Reichmanns' munificence, waxed ever bigger along with its generous benefactors.

In the mid-1950s, brothers Edward and Louis and their families settled in Montreal and Paul, Albert and Ralph and families came to Toronto. In 1958, after they had jointly established a constellation of companies, Paul forayed into real estate development, almost by accident. In seeking to build a new warehouse for Olympia Floor & Wall Tile, the family rejected the top bid of $125,000 as exorbitant; Paul, acting as his own contractor, did the job for $70,000.

It was Paul's uncanny business acumen, tempered by the cautious wisdom of Albert, Ralph and their father Samuel, that propelled Olympia and York's (O&Y)early successes with a series of Toronto properties, including the Toronto-Dominion Centre, The Toronto Star Building and First Canadian Place. What undoubtedly made them moguls on a world scale was their acquisition in 1977 of a $313-million package of eight office towers at bargain-basement prices at a time when New York City seemed to be sliding into insolvency. Hailed as the real estate "deal of the century," the purchase netted an estimated tenfold profit or more within only two years.

Thereafter they built many huge towers in many cities, always to the best standards, on time and within budget. In the early 1990s, Canary Wharf, the mega-development of 24 office buildings in a remote section of London's docklands, proved O&Y's undoing. As Bianco puts it, Paul was a gambler by nature who seemed almost convinced of his own infallibility, and let his ambition run unchecked, even as the company was on the brink of receivership, into which it ultimately fell.

"They never drew a line on their own ambitions," Bianco told The CJN during a recent interview here. "It would have been impossible for Paul to build a complex big enough or great enough that would have caused him to retire. I shudder to think what he would have done if Canary Wharf had succeeded right away. I guarantee he would have tried something on an even more massive scale; he would have been compelled to."

Bianco won early support for the biography from Edward Reichmann, the older brother who had long wanted to see the family saga in print. "I spent countless hours with him in Toronto, New York and Jerusalem. He gave me all sorts of important family documents, but after a while I was also coming up with documents that he didn't have; I was generating things that he really wanted to see. We were doing the same thing, in a way. There was an overlap of interests.

"I also made it clear to Edward that I was going to put him back into the family story, whereas in previous accounts it has always been the story of three brothers. Louis, the second brother, also had an interest in getting the story told right."

Bianco wrote to Paul, Albert and Ralph, asking for their co-operation, but got no reply. Then Paul's wife, Lea Reichmann, telephoned. "She said the letter convinced her that Paul should talk to me; the problem was getting his attention. Appointing herself my covert ally, she gave me his private number at home and convinced me to pester him at my end and she would pester him at her end."

Eventually Paul gave Bianco five interviews, each four to six hours long. "Once you get to him, if he wants to talk about something, he talks about it fully without any prompting. If he doesn't want to talk, he won't." Taking notes by hand, Bianco filled up an entire legal pad in the first interview alone.

Bianco devotes considerable space to the $102-million libel suit the family launched against Toronto Life magazine after a lengthy 1987 article gratuitously cast aspersions on the family's philanthropic activities in wartime Tangiers. The suit sent a chill through the Canadian media establishment and threatened to bankrupt the magazine until the parties reached an out-of- court settlement in 1991 that involved a $1-million charitable donation and the publication of a full-page apology.

Was Bianco affected by this libel chill? "It was something I certainly thought about," he admits. "I started with confidence in my ability to set a standard for research and writing that would keep me out of libel. It concentrates your mind to know that there has been a libel suit and you're going over the same ground again: you pay attention." (The Toronto Life lawsuit produced an unexpected bonus for Bianco, he says, since it compelled the Reich-

Eye on Arts

MUSEUM CONTROVERSY IN JERUSALEM

The Shock Value of Art

Among the new exhibitions at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem is the installation Within the Lines, by 27-year-old Israeli artist Ram Katzir. The display features a children's classroom with coloring books on the desks. The pictures seem innocent enough. One, for example, shows a person's hand feeding a doe.

After participants color them in, they learn that the pictures are not so childish and innocent after all: the hand feeding the doe, for example, belongs to Hitler. Other pictures are revealed as Hitler youth, Nazi soldiers cutting off Jewish sidelocks, Jewish children being herded to their deaths — in short, the unspeakable obscenities of the Holocaust.

If the idea is to contrast innocence and horror, or to show how art can manipulate, the exhibit works. It works so well, in fact, that it has shocked and enraged many Holocaust survivors, who find no particular solace in the fact that the artist is the grandson of survivors.

John Lemberger, executive director of AMCHA, an Israeli organization for survivors and their children, complains that the museum betrayed a deep insensitivity to the feelings of survivors. He claims the museum has received many protests from supporters around the world. AMCHA refused the museum's request to participate in a symposium on the issues raised by the exhibit.

Theatre Events

• Between Stages, a playwright's reading workshop at the Bloor JCC, features Sean Reycraft's Einstein And The Relativity of Dreams, Feb. 17, 8 p.m. Presented by the Bloor JCC Cultural Arts Group.

• The Yiddish Theatre and Its Influence On The Broadway Musical (Broadway's Jewish Roots), a program by singer and musical historian Faye Kellerstein, takes place at The Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St., Feb. 25, 7:30 p.m. Free admission.

• Theatre Columbus remounts The Attic, the Pearls and 3 Fine Girls, the quirky collective creation starring Leah Cherniak, Martha Ross and Ann-Marie MacDonald, at Buddies In Bad Times Theatre, 12 Alexander St., March 4 to 30. Tickets $14 to $17, Sunday PWYC. 416-975- 8555.

Musical Events

• Two international virtuosi, bass oboist Lawrence Cherney and bass clarinetist Henri Bok, have combined to form the duo Bass Instincts, which makes its Toronto debut at Glenn Gould Studio, Feb. 5 at 8 p.m. $10 & $15. 416-205-5555.

• The Lafayette Quartet — violinists Ann Elliott-Goldschmidt and Sharon Stanis, violist Joanna Hood and cellist Pamela Highbaugh Aloni — performs in the St. Lawrence Centre's Jane Mallett Theatre, Feb. 13, 8 p.m. $39 & $35. 416-214-1660.

In The Spotlight

Lawrence Weschler, staff writer for The New Yorker, dropped into town the other week to give an intriguing slideshow and lecture at the Art Gallery of Ontario related to his 1995 book, Mr. Wilson's Cabinet Of Wonders (Pantheon, $28.95).

Both book and lecture focus on the Museum of Jurassic Technology (MJT), a highly eccentric private institution in Los Angeles crammed full of incredible marvels of the ages — incredible because the items on display are not fully authentic and, in some instances, seem entirely invented by the fecund imagination of curator David Wilson.

Although the MJT documents its possessions with the usual display cards and recorded narratives featuring an institutional voice of authority, the museum ultimately tells visitors more about the nature of tricks, illusions and the structure of information than about any genuine curios or marvels that it allegedly contains.

Weschler's lecture, like his book, maintains Wilson's high level of play, with the effect of showing listeners (and readers) a bizarre peephole into a deeper reality. Unlike Wilson, however, Weschler ultimately "breaks irony" and lets his audience in on the game; yet he does so without deflating the museum. "I had to find some type of language that shelters him and honors him," Weschler explained.

Because the book may still "puncture the suspension of disbelief" that visitors must bring to the museum, it is not freely available in the MJT's gift shop. "Apparently it's only available under the counter and you have to ask for it specifically," Wechsler said. "It comes in a brown paper wrapper."

Reichmanns chronicled

manns to put much original family material onto the public record.)

He also chronicles the great eruv controversy that threatened to split Toronto's Orthodox community in 1986. The conflict erupted after a zealous rabbi whom the Reichmanns had imported from Israel attacked the validity of the existing eruv, the fenced-in area within which it is halachically permitted to carry on the Sabbath and religious holidays.

While admitting some of his mistakes regarding Canary Wharf, Paul has always maintained that the project was a viable one, and time is proving him right. In contrast to the bleak vacancy rates of earlier days, the development's 12 completed buildings are now about 84 per cent leased. This past year, Paul has invested $100 million— a sliver of his former personal wealth — for a five percent share of the project. He explained to Bianco that he intends to see Canary Wharf, the largest project he has ever undertaken, through to completion.

"I think he's in the early stages of a significant comeback as a developer," Bianco says. "I expect him to be really successful at it because for the first time, he is constrained by the fact that he's beholden to his financial partners in a way he never was before."

A masterpiece of biography, Bianco's definitive study ends with the very credible suggestion that the Reichmanns' achievements may not be over. "The family may never be as rich or as revered as they were but history suggests that the final chapter of the Book of Reichmann has not yet been written."

Business Profile

Paper biz 'chose' prominent publisher

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Paul Godfrey, president and CEO of Sun Media Corp., the third-largest newspaper group in Canada, oversees 10 daily newspapers, 61 weeklies and shopping guides, and 11 magazines and specialty publications.

Six months ago, Godfrey, 58, successfully led a $411-million management buyout of the former Sun Publishing Corp. (now called Sun Media), and became a co-owner of the giant media company he has headed since 1992.

Although he holds one of the most powerful positions in the Canadian newspaper industry, the former chairman of Metropolitan Toronto, is quick to admit that the newspaper business was not his "chosen" field. "I didn't choose it. It chose me."

In a recent interview at Sun Media's headquarters on King Street, Godfrey said that when Toronto Sun co-founder J. Douglas Creighton asked him to be publisher he tried to get Creighton to reconsider his offer.

"I spent an hour telling him what a bad idea I thought it was. Doug seemed to have confidence that I could do the job. He said, 'I can surround you with enough people who can teach you the newspaper business. You have something that I can't get in a lot of places... You know how to get along with people,'" Godfrey said.

Godfrey, who left city politics in 1984 to take the job, said he will always be grateful to Creighton for giving him the opportunity. "It was the best move I ever made."

Ironically, in 1992, when the board of directors fired head of Toronto Sun Publishing Creighton, the former chief Godfrey was appointed his successor. He declined to give details of the controversial dismissal which he described as "heartbreaking."

He acknowledges that the public exposure in the political arena landed him the top job at the Sun. "If I was still a chemical engineer, I would have never have been offered the job."

His career as a chemical engineer spanned 11 years, overlapping his early political life.

After graduating from the University of Toronto in 1962, Godfrey was hired by Canadian Industries Limited (CIL), where he worked as a technical sales development engineer until 1970. He did consulting work until he became a full-time politician in 1973.

It was his mother, Bess Godfrey, a political campaign manager, who launched Godfrey's political career. When she was asked to run for North York councillor in 1964 she promoted her son as the candidate. He first took municipal office in 1965 at the age of 25. By 1970, when he became a controller in North York, Godfrey said he knew he "had hit the crossroads." He left CIL. In 1973, he became Metro chairman, a position he held for 11 years.

"It was the most exciting wonderful experience anyone could have," he said. "It was an opportunity to take a young dynamic city and have a say in its future." He's particularly proud of his role in spearheading the construction of the Metro Convention Centre and the SkyDome and bringing professional baseball to Toronto, he said.

While the Blues Jays have become a Toronto institution, Godfrey is not one to rest on the laurels of success: He's now trying to bring the National Football League (NFL) to Toronto. A die-hard NFL fan, he attends the Super Bowl every year with his wife Gina and their three sons, Rob, Noah and Jay.

He said he's in the midst of forming an ownership group for an NFL team, which he can be part of now that he's out of public life.

Godfrey said he enjoyed politics "as much the last day as he did the first," but "it was time to give someone else a chance."

Describing himself as a "very hands-on guy," Godfrey said he learned every aspect of the newspaper business from editorial to distribution by spending time in each department: he watched the front page get put together, rode the delivery trucks and even made calls to advertisers.

As publisher he read the Sun's editorial page every day to make sure it reflected the official position of the newspaper, which he described as "small-C conservative" in that it espouses small government and promotes private enterprise. It is also pro-Israel.

He stressed that the Sun's philosophy was established at its inception in 1971, when the founders set out to create a paper that would be distinctly different from the other Toronto dailies.

A tabloid rather than a broadsheet, the Sun was designed to be both user-friendly and entertaining, Godfrey said, noting that along with the "controversial Sunshine Girl," there were plenty of pictures, entertainment and sports stories and opinionated columnists to maintain reader interest.

Sun Publishing expanded from 1978 through 1991, spawning the Calgary Sun, Edmonton Sun and Ottawa Sun, acquiring the majority interest in the Financial Post and gaining 10 more dailies and 50 weeklies through its acquisition of Bowes Publishers.

Today Sun Media employs 3,000 people and controls 82 publications. Godfrey especially touted the new media division established to explore opportunities on the Internet. In 1998, the company, in partnership with City TV, will be launching Pulse 24, a 24-hour local news station, which he calls the "CNN of Toronto."

Last summer, a 12-member Sun management group led by Godfrey saw an opportunity to gain ownership of the company when Rogers Communications put its majority interest in Sun Publishing up for sale, he said.

The managers did not want "the Sun to be a division of another company," and were willing to put their jobs on the line to battle their main contender, Quebecor Communications, Godfrey said.

If they had lost the bidding war, the managers would probably have been axed for forcing their future boss to spend more money to acquire the company, Godfrey said. "We decided in June that we would roll the dice. Either own the company or be out of work."

In August, they became co-owners with financial backing from the Ontario Teacher's Pension Plan Board and CIBC Wood Gundy. Trimark Financial Corporation and BCE Media Investments are more recent investors.

The manager-owners have a two percent share of the company, now privately-held, with an option to increase their shares based on the company's performance; employees will be able to buy up to $25,000 worth of shares in March, Godfrey said.

The fallout from the buyout was the highly-publicized layoffs of some 100 employees last fall. The layoffs, which were "difficult and gut-wrenching at times," were necessary for the company to meet its $250-million debt load, he said.

He declined to give income figures, but he said Sun Media is "doing extremely well. We're all walking around here beaming."

Godfrey did not rule out a fourth career. "There's great speculation here that if the [NFL] football team comes, I'm going to go run the team." But he'll have to take a pass at football if the NFL comes before he's fulfilled his obligations at Sun Media, he said.

"Life's full of funny twists and turns. I love the job here. But I also loved the job in politics. I've been very fortunate in life to date. All the jobs I've worked at I've loved to do. Most people dread Monday morning."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our third annual Purim Art Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit drawings about Purim.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 20. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small. Please paint, draw, or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.

Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, March 3, 1997.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners." The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 1997. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Gymnast wins Pan Am medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No pain, no gain.

It's an aphorism athletes like to cite to push themselves to greater efforts when they're going through their often excruciating workouts.

For Justin Gerson, that approach has paid off in recent years as the 18-year-old athlete has vaulted into the elite of Canadian gymnastics with top performances in a variety of meets. The 1996 junior national champion, Gerson can no doubt attribute much of his success to the gruelling training regimen that sees him in the gym six days a week for four hours at a time.

Since the new year, he's added to that back-breaking routine with two additional two-hour sessions every week, beginning at 6 a.m. at Vaughan Gymnastics Club. After that, he gathers his books together and heads to Thornhill Secondary School for his last year in the OAC program.

If you want the glory, you've got to pay the price and Gerson has his eyes set on world championships and the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, Australia.

To get there from here he's had to compete in a number of regional, national and international events and recently was a member of the Canadian team that finished second, behind only Cuba, at the Junior Pan American Games. What made the silver place finish particularly satisfying was that the Canadians edged the United States by two points and exacted a measure of revenge over a summertime loss to the Yanks at a meet in Colorado.

Gerson finished sixth overall at the Pan Am Games, with a fourth in rings and a seventh in parallel bars, his best showings. The Canadian team was led by Sasha Jeltkov, a Russian Jew who now trains in Montreal. Jeltkov, who was already a developed gymnast when he immigrated three or four years ago, was first in rings, first in vault and third in high bar.

Gerson was satisfied with his showing, especially considering he was the first competitor in two events and judges often base subsequent scores on that performance.

Gerson was first in pommel going into the final round, but a fall while attempting a "EE combination," one of the most difficult in gymnastics, lowered his score. The EE is a quadruple/quadruple combination, with four turns on one pommel followed by four turns on the other. The fall eliminated him from medal contention, he says.

He was happy with his rings routine. "I can't say I had a bad routine. I had a good routine, but the other guys were just [better]."

Gerson's progress up the gymnastics ladder will see him compete in Montreal as a senior in the Elite Canada competition in March. From there, he'll prepare for the National Championships in Ottawa, slated for May.

As a former junior now competing against the big boys, Gerson can expect to have a tough time getting the judges on his side. "I'm going to have to be consistent because the senior judges don't know me or respect me," he said. "I have to hit all my events."

Thirty percent of his ranking will come from his score at Elite Canada, while 70 per cent is derived from his showing at the Nationals.

In addition to those events, Gerson has a trip to Israel planned for this summer, where he'll compete in the quadrennial Maccabiah Games. As a 15-year-old junior in 1993, he finished seventh overall, helped by a gold medal performance in vault and a silver in rings.

Gerson should have some confidence going into the upcoming events. Late last year, prior to the Pan Am Games, he finished first in a national qualifying meet held in Burlington. And he's been putting in the hours, working on his routine and holding down a four-course load in school.

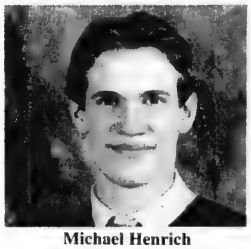
With all that pain, there's sure to be some gain.

Winger scores big at tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a rookie winger with the Barrie Colts of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), Michael Henrich doesn't get all that much ice time. But as a member of the Ontario team at the recent Under-17 World Hockey Challenge in Red Deer, Alta., Henrich was a key player as Ontario went on to win the tournament, beating teams from other regions of Canada, plus hockey powerhouses like Sweden, Russia and the United States.

In eight games patrolling the right wing, Henrich scored five goals and added five helpers for 10 points, putting him in the top three for the winning side. Reunited with his old linemate, David Inman, who played minor pee wee hockey with him, and Adam Campbell of Owen Sound Platers, the line was a force to be reckoned with as Ontario showed once again that Canadians play some of the best hockey anywhere.



Michael Henrich

The victory of the under-17 players came around the same time as the older juniors won the World Junior Championship for the fifth year in a row.

In the under 17 event, Henrich, 16, was given a simple task: score goals. "I'd always be out there on the first power play," he said.

For Henrich, the championship was his most satisfying moment as a hockey player. "It was a great experience. It was a world tournament, with the best players in the world. It showed me how I could play with them. It was like a dream. I was pretty happy."

A first round draft pick of the Colts last summer (fifth overall in the OHL), Henrich has quite a different role on that team. "It's more of a learning and developing year," he said. "I'm one of the younger guys. It's tough to work against players two or three years older."

Although he doesn't have a specified role with the Colts or even regular linemates, coach Bert Templeton has made it clear he expects a full effort from him. "He looks at you and says, 'work your hardest, get your nose dirty," Henrich says.

So far this season, he's gotten spot duty against tougher opponents and more ice time against weaker squads. Occasionally he sits out. His stats reflect his limited ice time. In his first 31 games of the season, Henrich scored four times and added 12 assists. He was also plus six.

Despite those numbers, Henrich sees improvement in his game. He believes he's become more aggressive as the season progressed and improved his quickness and his shot.

Exploring the underwater scenery of the Red Sea

By JOSIE NEWMAN
Special to The CJN

EILAT — Our Israeli Snuba diving leader finned his way through caves past large schools of yellow steepheaded parrotfish, blue fusilier and green moonwrasses. A particularly bold green and navy broomtail wrasse flirted with me as I swam behind the instructor, coming up close and darting away when I reached my hand out to him.

We were sampling the underwater scenery of the Red Sea near Eilat. There were three of us including the instructor, shackled to the line that linked us and our mouthpieces to the oxygen tanks resting in the overhead raft. Snuba diving is a modified form of scuba diving for beginning divers, who do 15 to 20 feet below the surface and are attached to the instructor and the line of the oxygen tank at all times.

Our 45-minute dive took us through fields of disc coral, hump coral, red sponge and numerous breeds of fish. The Red Sea is warm all year round, with temperatures of 18 to 25C, and caters to a variety of water sports including scuba diving, snorkelling, sailing, windsurfing and swimming with dolphins.

One of the best in the world

Our instructor was from Snuba Plus, one of a handful of dive schools that offer snuba diving and one of several which cater to experienced scuba divers. The underwater Coral Beach Nature Reserve which covers most of the waters around Eilat, is reputed to be one of the best in the world, with experts coming from Europe and North America to dive.

Snorkelling with four bottlenose dolphins at the Dolphin Reef was an adventure not to be missed, either. Our group of six was escorted by a guide who led us through the murky water that is home to Sindy, a hulking, friendly male, and his three female mates. The females were more elusive than Sindy, who allowed us to pat the soft, pliable skin on his head and side and rolled over to show us his belly.

The less physically active can find underwater adventure at Coral World in Eilat. They can take a submarine ride in "Jacqueline," the yellow submarine, to a depth of 60 metres past the "coral wall" with its underwater flora, fauna and school upon school of brilliant fish. The 40-minute ride includes a look at the Eilat fishing boat, a ship deliberately sunk by marine biologists for the benefit of marine life and tourists. When the ride is over, guests can peruse the underwater observatory which is like an underwater zoo complete with giant turtles and sharks.

Eilat became a modern resort town in the mid-1970s around the time the Sinai Desert was returned to the Egyptians. Of the one million visitors who came here annually, many came for sports adventures. More than half — 600,000 are Israeli while the other 400,000 are foreign tourists.

Every region of Israel, from the hiking trails of Galilee's forested mountains in the north to scuba and snuba diving in Eilat, has something to offer the adventure sports enthusiast.

Adventure travel and sports became popular with Israelis about 15 years ago and have since become popular with foreign tourists, particularly those returning for the second or third time, said Stanley Morais, of the Israel Government Tourist Office here in Toronto.

Information about tours conducted by the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel can be obtained by writing 13 Heleni Hamalka St., Room, Jerusalem or t 3 Hashfela St., Tel Aviv.

To obtain information about Snuba Plus, write Snuba Shallow Water Diving Tours Ltd., P.O. Box 2, Eilat, 88100, Israel or call 07-63 72 722.

Dolphin Reef Eilat offers a six-day diving program with the dolphins for U.S. $159 including two dives per day, tanks, weights, air or Nitrox refills, transportation and guide. More information can be obtained by writing Dolphin Reef Eilat, Southern Beach P.O.B., 104, Eilat 88100, Israel or calling 972-7-371846.

The Inside Back

About families

Dear Susan,

I am planning my son's bar mitzvah and I am beginning to find the whole exercise very nerve-racking, given family and community expectations. What should be a joyous occasion seems to be getting out of hand and I find myself growing increasingly anxious every day. Help!

Dear Reader,

It sounds like you are feeling pressured to aim for a style and standard with which you do not feel comfortable. Slow things down in order to give yourself a chance to gain some perspective. What type of bar mitzvah do you and your husband really want? How do your objectives reflect your family values as well as your budget?

When all is said and done, it is your son's day and your primary objective should be to provide an experience that will be most meaningful to him.

I think people lose their perspective when they feel obliged to keep up with the Joneses or cave into family pressures. Do what feels right for you and your son. Pick a venue that suits his needs and your family's values and capabilities. Do not give in to the temptation to overextend – in the end, your entire family will suffer if you do.

Many people use the bar mitzvah ceremony as a means to more immediate, temporal ends. It is a way to impress friends, family and business associates; it is used as a high card in the game of family politics; it is a signal to all and sundry of wealth, status and success. In the end, though, the bar mitzvah is a deeply significant religious event; it should be a rite of passage that is an important milestone in a man's life.

Right now, the planning process is a pressure-filled chore, but if you prepare intelligently and carefully, your planning will result in a truly meaningful event, a moment in time that will set your son on the path to adulthood and live in your family's memory.

EGGPLANT CHEESE PIE WITH ZUCCHINI CRUST

- 1 1/2 tblsp butter or margarine
- 1/2 cup onion, chopped
- 2 cloves garlic, minced
- 1 lb. eggplant, unpeeled, cut into 1/2-inch cubes
- 1/2 tsp salt
- 3/4 tsp oregano
- 3/4 tsp basil, dried
- 2 dashes cayenne
- 1 small zucchini, unpeeled, sliced
- 2/3 cup evaporated skim milk
- 1 egg
- 2 cups mozzarella, part-skim, grated

Preheat oven to 375°F. Melt butter or margarine. Saute onion, garlic and eggplant in large skillet for 2 minutes. Cover. Continue cooking about 5 minutes or until eggplant is soft, stirring a few times. Add salt, oregano, basil and cayenne. Stir well.

Line the bottom and sides of a greased 10" pie plate with the zucchini slices. Carefully spoon the eggplant mixture over them. Combine the evaporated milk, egg and cheese in a bowl. Pour over the vegetables. Bake for 30 minutes. Serve hot. Yield: 6 servings.

New York threatens boycott of Switzerland

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Swiss banks have responded to a threatened boycott by New York politicians with assurances that Switzerland already is working fast to set up a fund for Holocaust victims.

The New York state assembly and City of New York threatened last week to pull the rug out from under three Swiss banks operating in Manhattan if Switzerland does not make good on its promise to set up the fund.

The Swiss government announced last month that it would work with Swiss banks and insurance companies to establish a fund to begin compensating Holocaust victims and their heirs who might be entitled to assets deposited in Swiss banks during the World War II era.

The Swiss, however, have yet to provide specifics on the fund, and sources close to the issue say several pressing issues are unresolved.

Jewish officials have indicated that they will not wait long for Switzerland to turn its words into deeds, and the move by New York politicians adds another pressure point.

Swiss banking officials reportedly said that they are taking the boycott threat seriously, but expressed bewilderment at the timing of the New York proposals.

"This is hard to understand if you look exactly at what has been done already," Swiss Bankers Association spokesperson Silvia Matile was quoted as saying.

"I don't believe it was necessary to create extra pressure because the pace is already very fast," she added. "The concept for the fund will be worked out in the coming weeks."

New York state Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver said the assembly's banking committee would hold hearings Feb. 13, to examine ways to help Holocaust victims and their heirs reclaim their wealth.

In a statement, Silver said the committee would also review New York state's relationship with Swiss banks and examine how a foreign bank's licence or certification can be revoked.

"Swiss bankers must provide a full and honest accounting concerning these unclaimed funds and return these assets to their rightful owners," Silver said.

"Our obligation clearly extends to ensuring that all banking institutions operate in New York according to the highest ethical standards."

At the same time, the president of the New York City Council introduced a bill to prevent city funds from being deposited in Swiss banks until the compensation fund is established.

The actions mark the first time state and local governments have entered into the controversy surrounding the search for missing Jewish assets.

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress, welcomed the New York proposals as further help in "advancing the cause of justice and morality."

The Clinton administration, however, criticized the proposed moves.

"At this point, it is important that we cooperate and not front each other with threats that will lead to a retarding of the very real progress that we have made," said Undersecretary of Commerce Stuart Eizenstat, the administration's point man on the issue of missing Jewish assets and Switzerland's wartime role.

At least one Jewish group also said it believed that the threatened boycott is "premature."

"This comes at the very time when more hopeful signs are emerging from the Swiss banking community," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League. But he added that such measures could become necessary if the Swiss fail to take action.

Eizenstat also toned down U.S. criticism of a Swiss diplomatic cable that led to the resignation of Switzerland's ambassador to the United States.

ספרותנו

"המאהב" של א.ב. יהושע משמש מאז פירסומו כעדות למורכבות תופעת הנגדת תכנים ארציים עם תכנים רוחניים, חיפוש אחר זהות עצמית, אל מול זהות המדינה.

Lebanon pullout debated

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The long-standing debate about Israel's military presence in southern Lebanon is being renewed.

In an effort to arrive at a consensus, conservative and liberal Knesset members joined former senior security members for a meeting last weekend at the house of Gideon Ezra, a Likud Knesset member and former deputy director of the Shin Bet, to discuss options for Israeli policy in Lebanon.

These options included calling for a unilateral Israeli troop withdrawal not connected to a peace agreement with Syria or Lebanon, according to some of the meeting's participants.

The meeting came days after 73 Israeli soldiers and crew died in a crash of two helicopters that were transporting troops to southern Lebanon.

But Labor Knesset member Yossi Beilin, one of the organizers, stressed after the three-hour brainstorming session that the meeting had been scheduled about a week prior to the Feb. 4 mid-air helicopter collision over northern Israel.

Israel has maintained troops in the nine-mile wide security zone since 1985 to serve as a buffer for northern communities against attacks by Hezbollah and other groups.

Unilateral withdrawal an option

But a number of politicians have long argued that the zone does not fulfil this defensive objective.

At the same time, they add, the Israel Defence Force (IDF) is sustaining mounting casualties in the ongoing hostilities with Hezbollah gunmen operating in southern Lebanon.

On Sunday, seven Israeli soldiers were wounded in the security zone in a clash with Hezbollah militants. In retaliation, Israeli jets attacked suspected Hezbollah targets.

More than 200 IDF soldiers have reportedly been killed since 1985 in southern Lebanon.

Beilin, along with co-organizer Gideon Ezra, have previously called for an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

They maintain that the current strategy has not significantly improved security for Israel's northern settlements, which have come under repeated Hezbollah rocket assaults.

Last week, as Israel was burying the dead from the worst military air disaster in the country's history, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he would continue the Israeli presence in Lebanon.

His public security minister, Avigdor Kahalani, recently drew sharp criticism for calling Israeli troops serving there "sitting ducks."

Kahalani, a member of the Third Way Party, proposed a phased Israeli troop withdrawal, on condition that some international force replace them in the security zone.

Other Knesset members who attended the gathering included Yehuda Harel of the Third Way, Yitzhak Cohen of the Shas party and Michael Eitan of Likud.

Israel mourns

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Funerals were held last week throughout Israel to bury the 73 soldiers who died the evening of Feb. 4, when the two Yasur helicopters in which they were travelling collided over Shaar Yashuv in northern Israel.

An official national day of mourning was declared commencing on Feb. 5 with the first funeral and lasting until the evening of Feb. 6.

Each funeral was attended by at least one member of the Knesset or minister. President Ezer Weizman, who promised to meet every bereaved family, began the first of 73 condolence calls in Kfar Yona, at the home of Sgt. Maj. Saguy Arazi, 22.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu attended the funeral at Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem of St.-Sgt. Yonatan Amedi, 20, who was named after his brother killed in the 1976 Entebbe rescue the week Amedi was born.

Condolences Sent

MONTREAL — In a letter to Israel's ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, Canadian Jewish Congress has expressed its deepest condolences to the government and people of Israel following the tragic helicopter collision which killed at least 70 soldiers.

At Ontario region, chair Moshe Ronen requested that, for the duration of the week of shivah, flags be flown at half-mast and that a moment of silence be maintained preceding any meetings and K'El Maleh Rachamim be recited at the appropriate times.

Condolences were also sent by B'nai Brith Canada.

Hecht Appointed

TORONTO — Thomas Hecht has been named by B'nai Brith Canada as head of a special commission on Nazi war criminals .

The commission will devise a strategy to urge the federal government to pursue Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

A Secular Name Change

TORONTO — After almost 30 years of serving the Toronto Jewish community, the Secular Jewish Association is celebrating a new beginning with its recent decision to change its name.

Members recently voted to rename the group Oraynu: Community for Secular Humanistic Judaism.

Swiss Accounts

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress' National Holocaust Remembrance Committee is advising members of the community seeking information on dormant accounts in Swiss banks belonging to Holocaust victims or their heirs to obtain a questionnaire to lodge a claim.

Individuals who fall under this category should write to Swiss Banking Ombudsman, Seestrasse 7 — Postfach 519, 8027 Zurich, Switzerland. A copy of the completed questionnaire should be forwarded to the World Jewish Congress/World Jewish Restitution Organization, 501 Madison Ave. New York, NY. 10022-5602.

ISRAEL

Sabbath Flights Opposed

JERUSALEM — The Knesset voted down a bill calling for El Al to fly on Shabbat and Jewish holidays.

Arab Candidates For PM

JERUSALEM — A controversial proposal to bar Israeli Arabs from running for prime minister has been thrown out of the Knesset.

Knesset speaker Dan Tichon of the Likud and five of the seven deputy speakers ruled that the proposed bill would violate laws against racist legislation and therefore will not be brought before the plenum for a vote.

Pope Invited

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met last week at the Vatican with Pope John Paul II and invited the pontiff to come to Israel.

The Pope expressed interest in visiting Israel before the year 2000, but said he would first like to see more progress in the peace process.

WORLD

Ohio Man Denaturalized

NEW YORK — An Ohio man who had assisted in the persecution of Jews during World War II has been stripped of his U.S. citizenship by a federal judge in Cleveland.

Algimantis Dailide, 75, had served in the Vilnius Saugumas, the Lithuanian security service whose responsibilities paralleled those of the Gestapo, and had concealed his wartime past when entering the United States in 1949, Judge Paul Matia said.

Dailide, a Cleveland-area real estate agent, served in the Saugumas from 1941 to 1944 and "assisted in persecution of civilian populations," the judge said, making him ineligible for U.S. citizenship.

ABSORPTION STRAINS RESOURCES OF ISRAEL

While the struggle for free exit of Jews from the U.S.S.R. continues throughout the world, in Israel the focus has shifted from immigration to absorption. Israelis are now primarily concerned with the problem of providing Soviet Jews, arriving by the thousands every month, with the knowledge of Hebrew, the jobs and the housing that will enable them to become productive citizens.

It is expected that 70,000 immigrants — half from the U.S.S.R. — will arrive in 1972. Jewish Agency officials say it costs about $25,000 to bring in and absorb each immigrant, which means that $175 million will be required this year.

HEBREW COURSE LAUDED

The public school system has discarded its "WASP traditions" by announcing that languages other than those already recognized will be eligible for high school graduation, Saul Cowan, North York's school trustee said. Five North York secondary schools will offer Hebrew next September, following the announcement of the Ontario Department of Education's permitting an expansion of language subjects.

War of words erupts over war crimes case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has gone on the offensive in a war of words with Michael Code, the lawyer representing alleged Nazi war criminal Helmut Oberlander, calling his allegations of contempt of court unfounded and demanding a retraction.

Congress has merely advocated justice for Nazi war criminals and the suggestion that it exercised undue influence in the laying of charges against Oberlander "is absolutely odious," said Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber. He denied suggestions that Congress provided material that was used by the CBC in a documentary titled The Oberlander File, although Congress spokespersons were interviewed for the piece.

Farber acknowledged Code's suggestion that Congress representatives have met with the minister of justice, but they did so only to discuss policy issues on the war crimes portfolio. A letter by Code "leaves the innuendo that there was something adverse happening here," Farber said.

Farber was responding to a Feb. 4 letter from Code to Christopher Amerasinghe, a lawyer for the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

In the letter, Code suggests The Oberlander File was in contempt of court because it dealt with the merits of the case against his client. He also suggests that "special interest groups" interviewed in the piece were also in contempt. The letter, released to The CJN and other media by Code, goes on to suggest that "interest groups" interviewed for the program met with the minister of justice and "are clearly orchestrating a lot of adverse pre-trial publicity in order to apply 'pressure.'"

Later, Code criticizes the federal authorities for initiating the Oberlander case "with a barrage of media publicity... Conducting litigation by way of press release ...casts grave doubt on the attorney general's ability to carry out his duties with the historic neutrality... The appearance given by this press release was of a minister who was catering to the very interest groups who are now participating in contempt of court, together with a publicly funded broadcasting network."

Although Congress was not mentioned by name in Code's letter, it was the only Jewish organization interviewed in the CBC documentary. Keith Landy, Congress' honorary legal counsel, has written to Code "demanding a retraction in regards to his suggestion that Congress has in any way participated in contempt of court. It could do damage to the reputation of Congress because the statements are unfounded and especially in light of the fact that he's distributing the letter to many large media outlets in Canada," Farber said.

Code's letter also prompted a heated response from Irving Abella, the head of Congress' war crimes committee. "I think Mr. Code is running off at the mouth again. He's pulling out all the stops to defend his client... He's attempting to put up a smokescreen to deflect attention from his client."

Abella denied a suggestion in the letter that the CBC may have obtained information on the Oberlander case from Congress, saying "nothing in the Oberlander [documentary] came from us."

Dan Henry, senior legal counsel for the CBC, said "our story was based on documents available publicly." He denied suggestions the documentary was in contempt of court, saying "I don't believe reporting on the case in the way we did at this stage is in any way a concern for the fair adjudication of the issues before the [court]."

A subsequent letter by Code, responding to Congress' critiques, attempted to explain his position: "I am a great admirer of the work that Congress and others have done in insisting that alleged war criminals be brought to justice. Nothing in my letter suggests there could ever be anything improper about that work."

However, Code goes on to say that "once a case is before the

Israelis not alone in sadness and grief

The news was bitter and terrible. It stunned me into silence, as it did most of us in our community.

"More than 70 Israeli soldiers are dead as a result of a collision in the skies above northern Israel between two helicopters loaded with troops headed into south Lebanon. It is believed to be the worst military accident in Israel's history." Those were the words the newscaster read seriously but casually, in the late afternoon of Feb. 4.

He then went on to read the next item which dealt with O.J. Simpson's civil trial. His tone was the same: serious but casual. He didn't differentiate between the items. He didn't pause, clear his throat or feign even a slight, faint sigh. One story bled into the other.

So often, alas, we receive bitter and terrible news of war or terror or tragedy or loss in Israel.

But it never hurts less.

There is always the inner turmoil, the overwhelming physical sensation of sadness that rises in a wave of near nausea deep from within.

We think of our families and our friends in Israel.

We think of how young most of the 73 soldiers were, of how their lives ended so early and so terribly. From lullaby to hit parade to K'El Maleh Rachamim in so cruelly short a time. Their parents did not know to say goodbye.

That evening I told my children to make sure that they knew what had happened in Israel. I could not convey an understanding of what had happened. That was impossible because I too could not fully and in total truth understand what had happened.

I can imagine, but cannot understand the frantic fear and panic at hearing the awful, terrible, forever life-altering news that a son, or a father or a loved one had been killed in a frightful way and is never, ever coming home again.

Stunned thus by the news, I retreated into silence, to deal privately with the aching sadness that I knew so many people also felt.

Two days later, I received a phone call from a good friend, an Israeli on assignment, as it were, in Toronto.

We exchanged greetings as befitting our friendship and concern for one another, but in light of the week's news, there were no "pleasantries." And then, again befitting our friendship and concern for one another, and in the direct manner characteristic of most Israelis, he asked me plaintively not angrily, why he hadn't heard from anyone after the news of the crash.

Why were there so few personal contacts, so few expressions of empathy and support? He and his wife were left to wonder where were their friends, where was the much-vaunted community of Jewish brotherhood and family and unity?

They felt hurt and so alone.

I stumbled for reasons, for excuses, but in truth, there were none, at least none that could explain. And I felt embarrassed and ashamed.

My silence had contributed to their feeling of "abandonment." I had assumed that because we all "grieved," we all sought retreat, if not comfort, in the privacy of silence. But I was very wrong.

It is certainly true that no words can abate an unabatable loss. But it is equally true that there are indeed words of support that reach out to a friend and say "You are not alone in your sadness and your grief."

Among the many wise and instructive proverbs our sages recorded for us is one that teaches us: "A word fittingly spoken is like apples of gold in settings of silver."

In times of personal and national mourning, how much more fitting than a word to a friend of comfort and support?

One people

After he heard the news of the helicopter collision, Ya'acov Erez, editorial writer for Ma'ariv wrote the following: "Just as it was with the Rabin murder, Beit Lid, the Dizengoff Centre explosion, the initial report was low key...It later became clear that two Yasur helicopters were involved, and reports spoke of twenty casualties. Then 30. And 50. And 70 and more.

"And you then try to turn that horrible number into something comprehensible, tangible. You search for a name, a face, perhaps an acquaintance. You search for all those things you do not want to find...And you always do.

"Because all those who are called the best of our boys are the best of our children. This night you searched for them. First, your own children. Afterwards your friends, and then their friends, and their children, and the friends of their children, an entire nation trembling by the phone. These are the moments when Israel is not a nation. It is a shared home.

"During this bleak night, between the thunder and lightning and snow storms, during this foggy night in which we skipped a number of heartbeats, during this morose and bitter night, in which all has been forgotten and in which we returned, for a single moment, to that which we truly are:one people."

Hadassah-WIZO president focuses on group's future

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like many Hadassah-WIZO members, Patricia Joy Alpert joined the organization as a young bride seeking a social outlet. Four decades later the Carmel chapter member feels the Zionist group has enriched her life in many ways.

Now Hadassah-WIZO's national president, Pat Alpert succeeded Judy Mandleman of Vancouver for a three-year term last November. The second member of her chapter to serve as national president (Esther Matlow was the first), she is focusing on ways to take the organization into the 21st century.

"We have made a tremendous effort to adapt our way of business to the new lifestyles," she said during a recent interview, citing increased efficiency in response to increased time constraints. While evening meetings have accommodated working women for years, Alpert has noted a recent trend among younger members to bring their babies to meetings.

No stranger to the demands of combining work and parenthood, Alpert was a working mother before it became common. An artist who has exhibited here and in several large American cities, Alpert is also a teacher and worked for the North York Board of Education for 11 years.

Pat Alpert

Her two daughters, now grown, have their own children. Pictures of the four grandchildren are displayed in the Alperts' condo, where a toy-filled plastic laundry basket sits under a wall of art in the elegant living room.

Alpert's resume, like her home, reflects a variety of interests. Her professional background includes a stint as a designer at Simpson's and another as a researcher at a film company. In the volunteer sector, she has held dozens of positions at both Jewish and non-Jewish organizations, and in 1995 received community volunteer recognition awards from both the Jewish National Fund and Hadassah-WIZO in Toronto.

Alpert sees her active community involvement as a way of paying her dues, she said. In the Jewish arena, "it's our responsibility as committed Jews to ensure there is an Israel, and my vehicle is Hadassah-WIZO."

Having just returned from the world WIZO plenary in Israel, Alpert was particularly enthused about recently established WIZO presences in countries like Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia and Hungary. "The needs are tremendous there. I was extremely proud to be part of an organization that had such broad outreach."

For Alpert, part of Hadassah-WIZO's appeal is the range of causes it supports. Its double-barreled name is unique to Canada, stemming from a decision by local community leaders early in the century to support both international Zionist organizations. Their projects include several university chairs, two hospitals and assistance for needy children and abused women.

"We use Hadassah-WIZO as a learning vehicle, to educate, to raise funds for specific projects in Israel. If there is a problem, we try very hard to find a way to embrace it. I love to think we are so open and ready to change."

The organization offers leadership training to younger members, and there is a concerted effort to "have a very good representation of young women on the executive board," said Alpert, herself a second-generation member of the 15,000-strong organization.

Younger members "are the future," she said. "We want them to give us their input. We want to know what they want and expect as volunteers. We want to give them responsibility so they will be good leaders, and we want them to feel very valued, which they certainly are."

CLARIFICATION

The article "Jewish law students gather in Toronto" (CJN, Feb. 6) did not clarify that Ari Kaplan, outgoing CJLSA president, also organized the conference, which was hailed by participants as an unprecedented success.

Relations with Jordan expected to improve

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's strained relations with Jordan are likely to improve when Benjamin Netanyahu visits Amman later this year, predicts an Israeli scholar.

Netanyahu was scheduled to fly to Jordan last week, but cancelled the trip when the nation was plunged into mourning following the deaths of 73 Israeli soldiers and airmen in the mid-air collision of two helicopters in northern Israel.

Joseph Nevo, a Haifa University historian, said Netanyahu's forthcoming visit is expected to put Israel's relations with Jordan back on an even keel now that Israel and the PLO have signed the Hebron accord.

The relationship deteriorated after widespread Arab-Israeli violence in the territories last September in the wake of Israel's decision to open an entrance to an archeological tunnel in east Jerusalem.

"King Hussein believes that the interests of his Hashemite kingdom and of his people require an improvement in relations with Israel," said Nevo, a specialist in Jordan who was here on the last leg of a North American lecture tour at the invitation of the Israeli government.

"The king genuinely believes that Jordan can benefit economically from the peace process," explained Nevo, now dean of students at Haifa University. "Jordan is in desperate need of job-creation projects."

Jordan's official unemployment rate stands at 20 percent and its external debt has ballooned to $7 billion (US).

Nevo, the author of several books about Jordan, claimed that it will be the first Arab country to reap the tangible fruits of peaceful coexistence should the peace process continue on all fronts.

Jordan's business elite strongly supports efforts to normalize ties with Israel, realizing that Jordan could become a bridge between the Jewish state and the rest of the Arab world.

But normalization is adamantly opposed by intellectuals, professional associations, Islamic fundamentalists, neo-Nasserites and pan-Arabists, he stated in an interview.

In general, they regard Israel as an alien element in the Middle East and fear that Jordan — the second Arab country to sign a peace treaty with Israel — will be dominated by Israel.

However, they "play by the rules of the game," voicing opposition to normalization without resorting to outright violence.

In Nevo's estimation, at least half of Jordan's population is passive toward normalization. "They are basically neither for or against it."

King Hussein remains popular and can effectively deal with unrest, said Nevo, who holds a PhD in Middle Eastern history from Tel Aviv University.

A frequent lecturer on the Arab-Israeli conflict, Nevo suggested that Israel cannot hope to sign a peace treaty with Syria unless it is prepared to vacate the bulk of the Golan Heights.

He said the Syrians will not accept anything less than a full withdrawal to the internationally recognized border.

Turning to Egypt, Nevo said that the objective of its diplomacy is to push back Israel to the pre-1967 lines.

"Egypt wants a small, weak Israel, dependent on the goodwill of the Arabs. Egypt wants to abolish Israel's qualitative military advantage," he said, referring to Israel's nuclear arsenal.

Egypt's cold peace with Israel is also a function of domestic constraints, Nevo noted. To appease Islamic fundamentalists and neo-Nasserites, the Egyptian government keeps Israel at arm's length.

Nevo, who has closely studied Israeli Arabs, said that they harbor three basic grievances. They feel like second-class citizens in terms of local budget allocations. They believe they should be officially recognized as a "national minority." They demand equal treatment with respect to employment opportunities.

Arab militants, he added, want Israel to be defined as a state of all its inhabitants rather than as a purely Jewish state. No Israeli government will accede to that demand, he observed.

According to Nevo, Israeli Arabs have been influenced by two contradictory trends since the Six Day War: Palestinization and Israelization.

"The majority, however, consider themselves loyal citizens and wish to be integrated into Israeli society."

Main Israeli parties similar and centrist, professor says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite increasing polarization in Israel, there is still a strong group at the centre that leans neither left nor right, says a professor of political geography at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

"Extremists seem to have taken over the streets, but the reality is that the last election campaign was fought [with people] always conscious of the fact that something has to be compromised," said David Newman, who spoke at the first of a recent two-part lecture series sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and Holy Blossom Temple.

In the last election, the Labor party emphasized the concept of security and peace, said Newman. "Likud spoke about security as well, but it had to convince Israelis that in principle, the party was in favor of the peace process, depending on the process."

The campaigns of Yitzhak Rabin and Benjamin Netanyahu competed for the political centre, not the extremes, Newman said.

"The groups on the right and left are clear for whom they will vote. The centre always tends to be won by someone who can create the security profile. It goes for the security discourse. The two messages put out by the parties, then, were similar and centrist, not polarized. Both parties said they wanted peace and security."

For Newman, it's not difficult to see which group in Israel is most vociferous in exercising its democratic rights: "I believe the right wing has demonstrated most effectively. It is usually that group that we see out on the streets. The right wing always acts as if it is in the opposition, whether it is in power or not. It has not gone home because it is in power. It acts as the watchdog to ensure that its party does not give in to the centre.

"We do not find the same form of day to day commitment on the other side. It is not as good in getting its act out on the street. [That may be] because the argument for the right is clearly defined. The left argument has more questions — there is more diversity of opinion," Newman said.

Exhibit explores influence of science on society

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Entitled, simply, A Question of Truth, a thought-provoking new exhibit at the Ontario Science Centre asks some hard questions of science, among them: How was it possible that doctors murdered people during the Third Reich?

Over four years in the making, the exhibit, consisting of 40 interactive displays, examines and challenges the shibboleths of western science and the "truths" it supposedly imparts. One of the exhibit's points is that beliefs about differences between people have often been incorporated into the practice of science, even if those beliefs are obviously biased.

It's the first time the Science Centre, so long at the forefront of teaching science, has looked critically at the influence of science and technology on society – an influence that has often caused pain and misery.

A recent lecture at the centre by three noted authorities looked at one of those areas: medicine, specifically, how doctors in Nazi Germany paved the way for the gas chambers and crematoria of the death camps.

Dr. William Seidelman, an AIDS expert at Toronto's Wellesley Hospital and who's spearheading an effort to establish the Centre for the Study of Medicine and the Holocaust at the University of Toronto's medical school, noted the irony of Germany being the birthplace of modern medical science.

During the Third Reich, he said, it was doctors – supposedly compassionate and educated professionals – who did the state's evil bidding when it came to propagating bizarre theories of race, hygiene and eugenics.

But more alarming was the fact that doctors helped the state forcibly sterilize over 400,000 "defectives," and quietly gas over 2,000 physically and mentally handicapped in the so-called T-4 euthanasia program, carried out at six killing centres inside the Reich.

Apart from one on Nazi science, exhibits discuss racism, genetics, sexism and other controversial areas, all challenging conventional truths.

The exhibit is a permanent addition to the centre. Related lectures, films, workshops and seminars continue until June 22.

Morris chatted with some of Broadway's greats

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Gerry Morris, syndicated New York Broadway critic, chronicler of some of theatre's greatest personalities and featured drama critic for The Canadian Jewish News for more than a decade, died Feb. 2 in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., at the age of 73.

A sensitive and articulate individual, he was known as Broadway Gerry to his friends. Business failures and the subsequent rebuilding of his life led him to have a set of values based on friendship and loyalty. He had a joie de vivre and recognized the importance of living every day to its fullest. He became a vegetarian and developed a physical fitness regime.

Born in Woolwich, a poor working class area of London, Morris came to Canada as a young boy. After dropping out of high school, he became a wonder in the real estate business. He and his friend Riley Brethour founded Brethour and Morris Real Estate, a company that became one of the top three in Canadian real estate in the 1950s.

The crash for Brethour and Morris came in 1959, when the company ventured into the construction business. In 1987, in an interview with The CJN, Morris said that at this low ebb in his life, he realized that "my life had been hollow and emotionally unrewarding. I learned to appreciate and nurture good friendships and I began by making friends with myself." He successfully re-entered the realty finance business.

Because of Morris' love of music and show business, he had involved Brethour and Morris in the production of plays and the sponsorship of free concerts. After his corporate comeback, what he called his "shameless love affair with Broadway" took a turn when he was in Florida spending time with close friends Harry and Arlene Rasky and he met legendary lyricist Irving Caesar, who wrote such favorites as Swanee and Tea for Two.

Morris impressed Caesar, as he did all who knew him, with his encyclopedic memory of composers and the words to songs he was always ready to sing, whether dining in a restaurant or at a ball game.

Caesar sponsored Morris' membership in the prestigious New York Friars Club, a show business organization that became his home away from home on his frequent trips to New York.

His writing career began at The CJN when his longtime friend, H. Max Swarz, encouraged him to contact CJN editor Maurice Lucow and offer to write New York theatre reviews and profile the stars.

He became a regular feature writer for the Friars Club's publication, Ye Epistle, profiling George Burns, Sid Caesar, Jackie Mason, Red Buttons, Dinah Shore, Liza Minelli, Frank Sinatra and numerous other luminaries in the entertainment world.

Few people can live out their fantasies. Morris was a remarkable individual who followed his dream and created warm relationships with each person he interviewed.

But above all, Morris will be remembered for his dedication to family and friends.

His longtime friend, psychiatrist Dr. Stanley Greben, summed up the feelings of his numerous friends: "Gerry understood more about friendship than anyone I have met. His friendships were very reciprocal. He was tremendously loyal when he found people who deserved loyalty and who gave it in return. What counted with Gerry was people's character, lack of pretensions and true values."

"Gerry Morris admired people of achievement. If he had respect for what you did, he would do anything humanly possible to give you the utmost support, respect and dignity," said community leader Judy Feld Carr.

This writer was privileged to be Gerry Morris' friend and grateful that he brought his love of life and humanity to her world.

He is mourned by his parents, Fay and Harvie Morris, and leaves a sister, Helen Pearl (Keshen).

Congress hears report on Israel

TORONTO —The general consensus in Israel is that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has accepted the principle of a Palestinian state, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen said here Jan. 23.

On a private visit to Israel, Ronen said he found that Israelis, whether of the left or right, are united behind the government.

"Netanyahu said he was forced to deal with reality in the midnight signing of the deal wth Arafat on Hebron," Ronen told the region executive, "but the prime minister said he extracted from theAmericans a promise that Israel would determine its own boundaries."

Some Israelis say the Hebron deal will not work out, he said. "It is a question of time. The next few months will determine it.

The mood in Israel was "quite flat" after the Hebron signing compared to other historic moments, Ronen said. "The reaction was serious in Hebron from Jews within the community, but fortunately it was a restrained reaction. The settlers kept their word."

Dark labyrinth

The sight of the emotional devastation in Israel as a result of the mishap over Shaar Yashuv must have inspired within the murderous plotters of Hezbollah a desire to see more blood. For, barely more than 24 hours after the last of the 73 soldiers was buried, Hezbollah launched yet another attack against the IDF and seven Israeli soldiers were wounded.

This was the backdrop for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as he was set to travel to Washington to meet with President Bill Clinton. The key subject on their agenda is the reinvigorated peace process and in particular, the possibility of renewed negotiations with Syria.

But entering negotiations with Syria is like entering a labyrinth. There is never a direct path to the final point. It conceals a number of false entries, trap doors and murky precincts in whose dark chambers lurk deadly surrogates and anti-peace fanatics.

Despite the frustration and the disappointment, the government of Israel presses forward seeking a path to peace. Foreign Minister David Levy revealed to the media he has proposed that talks with Syria restart on the basis of the 1991 Madrid framework and UN resolutions 242 and 338. The United States wishes to pursue the proposal. There is even a hint that Syria may want to pursue it as well. In conversation with Miguel Angel Moratinos, the European Union (EU) envoy to the Middle East, Syrian president Hafez al-Assad reportedly said that Israel "was entitled to full security". But even as he talked smoothly to the EU, Assad continued to pave the labyrinth's precincts with more deceit and intended death.

It was also revealed by Levy that since Operation Grapes of Wrath in April, Hezbollah has received some 30 Iranian planeloads of weapons.

The entry of these weapons into south Lebanon requires that they arrive first at the airport in Damascus.

Special athletes

The Special Olympics World Winter Games concluded last week with a heartwarming, inspirational ceremony at Ontario Place in Toronto. For six days, more than 2,000 mentally disabled athletes from all over the world assembled in southern Ontario and competed in spirited, friendly competition in a range of winter sports.

The message to the athletes from Tim Shriver, president of the Special Olympics, at the triumphant closing ceremony is one we should all take to heart: "Go home and tell people the stories of this place and the Special Olympics, where everyone can make a difference...Tell everyone you have seen the power of the human spirit here in Canada."

The power and the force of that human spirit were so clearly on display throughout the six days of competition. We saw them in the myriad poignant expressions of physical assertion, of victory and of defeat. And as was evident to anyone who caught even the merest glimpse of these expressions, the competitions liberated the young men and women athletes from the constraints and the confinements of blinkered stereotypes and diminished expectations.

In doing so, they also liberated us, helping us move closer to a better, more inclusive society, nearer to that faintly flickering human point of enlightenment and love from which radiates at least the appreciation, if not the total understanding, of the mystery that lives in us all.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"Zionism is a homecoming to the Jewish fold even before it becomes a homecoming to the Jewish land. We, the children who have returned, find much redress under the ancestral roof, for some of our brothers have sunk deep into misery."

(From Herzl's opening address to the Congress)

Objects to Himel's first column

Your introduction of Martin Himel as your new monthly columnist from Israel is puzzling. I do not remember an article more full of sarcasm, defeatism and defamation.

Let me remind Himel that the concept of ein brera (no choice), is not one which Israelis have voluntarily adopted. Instead, it was a necessary reaction to the onslaught of their enemies, and the determination of Jews to survive.

He again sarcastically states: "We have chosen to fight, chosen to live in the Jewish Mideast ghetto." Is he really suggesting that somehow Israel's behavior is the cause of Arab hostility towards the Jewish state, and that if only Israel changes its way the Arab world would embrace her? Is it really so difficult or frightening for Himel to confront the reality that the hostility which others feel towards Israel or Jews has nothing to do with our behavior?

If Israel does resemble a Jewish Mideast ghetto, it is only because of the unrelenting terror of its hostile enemies.

Trials of war criminals back on track

It is gratifying and reassuring that the Federal Court of Appeal has set back on course the proceedings against Helmut Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johann Dueck, and has acknowledged that the meeting between Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson and Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac simply addressed expediting these cases and not, as Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen had ruled, that there was a breach of judicial independence and intervention by the government necessitating a stay of the three proceedings so that they would never be tried on their merits.

Perhaps, when the actual evidence is finally heard and considered, Cullen will realize that he was not staying a traffic ticket because of a wrong address or a typographical error. Plain and simply, Associate Chief Justice James Jerome failed to deal with the cases expeditiously and that was the basis of the Justice Department's concern.

In his letter praising Arnold Fradkin for his articles detailing the Canadian government's dismal record in dealing with Nazi war criminals in Canada, Irving Abella refers to former solicitor general Robert Kaplan's vain attempt to convince his cabinet colleagues to move against Canada's Nazi war criminals. If memory serves me correctly, both James Jerome and Bud Cullen were members of Pierre Trudeau's cabinet.

Objects to snake as metaphor

I feel that your use of a non-human animal, the snake, as a metaphor for terrorism, in your Jan. 16 editorial, is unfortunate. There is no need for any newspaper to contribute to the tragic stereotyping of our fellow creatures, a factor which has contributed to the massive onslaught against the non-human world.

I believe The CJN could make a contribution to nature education. It could highlight Jewish involvement in this very important work and could carry critical pieces on how life here and in Israel relates to nature conservation, the positive and the negative.

Five per cent are not lesser Jews

I am a member of the Jewish community in Toronto. In The CJN, Jan. 23, you published a chart which enclosed statistical information regarding world Jewry for 1996. While it is essential for such figures to be published, I was extremely disappointed to find out that so many countries, including India, were not among the national breakdown.

I refuse to be viewed as a lesser Jew. Indian men and women have fought for the causes of Israel and the Jewish name. Indian men and women have contributed in the past and still continue to contribute to the world of the Jewish people in terms of literature, the arts and politics. My late grandfathers were both influential writers within the Indo-Jewish community.

It seems that a certain percentage of the Jewish population is extremely ignorant about people of Sephardi origin. It is high time to educate the world, and yes, our people, about the diversity of this religion. We were, and still continue to be, target victims of many racist/anti-Semitic and ignorant events.

I am appalled at the level of ignorance displayed in leaving out the "other" five percent. There are Jews in such countries as Ethiopia, Egypt, Iraq, Yemen, Morocco, Germany and Poland who have been ignored.

In order to keep our faith alive, we must not ignore our people. We are all Jews. We are all God's children.

Opinions

Ideological realignment in Israel

Something is happening to the ideological divide between right and left in Israeli politics. With the signing of Hebron agreement of the Oslo accords, and the subsequent vote of 87 Knesset members in its favor, a new Israeli consensus for peace involving territorial compromise has clearly emerged. When Israeli troops redeployed in Hebron, the Israeli political right cracked, and a new divide was created. The mainstream Likud and some of the religious parties acknowledged the inevitability of the Oslo process. The opposition on the right now includes minority voices in the Likud (represented ably by Benny Begin who resigned), the National Religious Party (with whom many in the settler movement are affiliated), and small factions such as Rehavam Ze'evi's Moledet.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Three recent events illustrate the new reality in the Likud. For the last several months, a group of Likud MKs led by Michael Eitan has been working on a joint proposal for a permanent agreement on the territories with a group of Labor MKs led by Yossi Beilin, a key architect of the Oslo accords. The joint statement, which was published late last month, parallels an agreement reached in late 1995 by Beilin and Abu-Mazen, a key figure in the Palestinian leadership. In both documents, Jerusalem remains the undivided capital of Israel, and most of the Israeli settlements in the territories remain intact.

Beilin has described the Labor-Likud report as a watershed: "The Likud now understands that the Oslo process leads to separation between Palestinians and Israelis within the Land of Israel, and Labor understands that the big blocs of settlements will determine the final-status map."

Eitan says, "In the Likud faction...there is an absolute majority in favor of my position. They just haven't come out of the closet yet."

In a recent interview, Ronni Milo, the mayor of Tel Aviv and chair of World Likud, spoke openly of the realism that has crept into the Likud position over time, and of his own political odyssey from being a "superhawk" to an outspoken supporter of the Oslo accords. He described the critical moment in his own thinking as the Lebanon War, when he realized the complexities of Israel's predicament and the dangers of seeing it in black and white terms. "History will judge," he says, "if Benny Begin and Yitzhak Shamir were right, or if Menachem Begin was right in signing the Camp David accords and the peace agreements will win. I hope they will, and that I am right and Benny Begin is wrong, because if there is no hope for peace, the future will be bleak."

Milo spoke openly of the demise of the dream of a Greater Israel. "There is no doubt...even if some of the settlements stay under our control, it is clear that Gaza and large areas of Judea and Samaria will be part of a demilitarized Palestinian state. If a poll were taken in the Likud, I am convinced that many would agree with me." Milo has been touted by some as Netanyahu's successor — perhaps in the year 2004, or as the leader of a new centrist party along with Haim Ramon, which may run as early as the elections in 2000.

In a recent column, Meir Sheetrit, a Likud MK, called upon Netanyahu to put his own, activist stamp on the peace process, precisely because he is a Likud prime minister. He challenged Netanyahu to make his own personal choice for peace, and to take advantage of the broad support for the process that only he can deliver.

Some political analysts have already speculated about the potential "big bang" in Israeli politics — a serious realignment of the political map. According to this theory, Labor and Likud of the future may look very different than they do today. With a consensus on a relationship with the Palestinians that crosses party lines, the two parties will find themselves competing for the votes of the centre, unless they break off from their extremes on the left and right, and...amalgamate.

It seems unlikely in the near future, but young politicians like Milo and Ramon recognize that the issues of tomorrow will be about quality of life and relations between Israelis. The battleground on these issues will be a reshaped political arena, where former political foes may find themselves on the same side.

Aboriginal and Jewish continuity

I recently attended two conferences on the same day held at McGill University. The first was sponsored by the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada, devoted to analysing the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. The second was sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, dealing with Jewish continuity. The juxtaposition provoked several reflections.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The Aboriginal conference was far larger, and drew participants from all over Canada, a liberal mix of academics, students and Aboriginals. The Jewish continuity conference drew participants from Montreal, mainly Jewish communal activists, professionals and a few concerned citizens and students.

First some similarities. Both groups — or rather communal leaders from both groups — are obsessed with survival, primarily cultural survival. For both, the fear of assimilation is palpable. Both feel their cultures are under attack: their languages, their traditional religious ways, their basic values. And both are right, though now the dangers are those of seduction whereas in the past they have been those of coercion.

Both have severe problems with intermarriage, with generational continuity affected differently by gender. Children of Aboriginal women who marry out have historically lost their Aboriginal status; not so for the men. Children of Jewish women who marry out have retained their halachic status as Jews; not so for the men. In both cases, one of the consequent problems is an ongoing debate as to "Who is a Jew?" or "Who is an Aboriginal?"

Both groups have a sense of themselves as groups — as nations — with very old histories. For Jews, one can speak of a coherent group history of at least 4,000 years; Aboriginals claim an even longer history in North America. The concept of an authentic tradition rests heavily on both. And both have long traditions of self-government and communal decision-making.

Both groups have had a long history of severe victimization. Jews, depending on their preferred historical time frame, can trace their victimization to the destruction of the First or Second Temple, or in the more recent period, from the Crusades or the Inquisition.

Similarly, for most Aboriginals in North America, the past five centuries since the arrival of the European colonizers has often been seen as the beginning of an unbroken record of suffering and dispossession. While the Holocaust is more clearly a case of deliberate overt extermination, there is no doubt that the fate of Aboriginals in the New World can also be described by the term genocide, both deliberate and systemic, both physical and cultural.

Both groups also have a dualistic diaspora tension. For Jews, it is between Israel and the Golah/Diaspora. For Aboriginals, their Zion is the reserve or territory, their exile is the city.

Both conferences were exercises in "process" and not solution finding. The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, which met over several years, involved thousands of Aboriginal Canadians in a process of reflection. Conferences on the crisis of Jewish continuity have proliferated over the past several years. Few innovative, concrete solutions come from such conferences. But they do have an important role, as both group therapy and as a forum for disseminating ideas.

Now two differences between the groups: For all the dire gloom and doom predictions emanating from Jewish quarters, the plight of Aboriginal Canadians is many times greater than anything real or imagined facing Canadian Jews. The much higher levels of Jewish attainment in terms of education, occupation and income give to the Jewish community an economic base for communal development. The tradition of Jewish philanthropy and the existence of key "big givers" committed to Judaism have made Jews less dependent on government support.

In tradition, Jews were lucky enough to have had an early literate tradition. This enabled them to shift from being a nomadic and then agricultural people to one with a portable culture which could fit in a suitcase holding a Tanach and a siddur and several key religious artifacts. Aboriginal peoples possess a profoundly spiritual culture which remains land-based and largely oral. A common bible and a common prayer book were crucial tools that helped Jews to survive. They may serve a similar purpose for Aboriginal peoples, if or when they are created.

Kissinger vs. Brzezinski

Some weeks ago, a letter authored by a group of former American government officials was printed in major newspapers. Addressed to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel, it asked him to forsake his present territorial policies, abide by the Oslo agreement and cease enlarging Jewish settlements in the territories and building new ones. The letter received vigorous support from the New York Times and the Washington Post as well as from Labor circles in Israel.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But not everyone agreed, and some prominent Americans, led by former secretary of state Henry Kissinger, refused to sign.

All of this evoked relatively little attention, until a public debate was held between Kissinger and Zbigniew Brzezinski at the end of December on public television.

Brzezinski's point was this: all American governments for the last three decades — ever since Israel gained possession of the West Bank in 1967 — have opposed the building and enlargement of Jewish settlements and have considered them as counterproductive to any peace process and to settling the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. At this time, he said, the issue of settlements is especially sensitive and makes a final agreement between Israel and the Palestinians more difficult. Just imagine, he said, what would happen if Palestinians in East Jerusalem would greatly enlarge their numbers and state that this was merely normal accretion.

Kissinger explained why he had chosen to stand aside from his former colleagues. His main point was this: the letter unfairly singles out Israel as the guilty party in stalling the peace process. It fails to acknowledge the part that Yasser Arafat has played in violating the accord. Taking sides in this fashion, he averred, robs the United States of its potential as a peacemaker and deals a blow to the whole process from which it may not recover.

When I read excerpts from the daily Hebrew press, I am convinced that the positions put forth by these two men fairly reflect what is said in Israel itself. What is at the base of it? It is an assessment of who the Arabs are and what their real purpose is. The right wing believes that any agreements with the Arabs that will give them added territory and independence will produce a base from which to attack Israel in the future. For, so goes the argument, the majority of Arabs have never abandoned their hope of destroying Israel, and Arafat has said repeatedly that all agreements into which he would enter would only be stages preparing for the final battle.

Those who continue to support the peace process deny such conclusions. Rather, they believe that a gradual process of living together will in the end lead to increasing Arab-Israeli trust and cooperation. The readiness of so many Arab states to join trade and diplomatic relations with Israel, is a sign that they had been waiting for some gesture of conciliation.

Being an optimist, I have always felt that most people do not want war. I also believe that most Arabs and Israelis want to live in peace.

Jewish life stirring again in eastern Germany

After decades of silence, Jewish life is stirring once again in eastern Germany. Due to an influx of Jews from the former Soviet Union, communities that had been eradicated by the Nazis are re-emerging.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Michel Friedman, a Frankfurt-based member of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, believes that about 5,000 Soviet Jews have settled in Germany's eastern states, known as the German Democratic Republic or East Germany, until reunification in 1990.

Since 1989, upwards of 50,000 Jews, or persons of partial Jewish ancestry, have arrived in Germany.

This infusion has more than doubled the size of Germany's Jewish community, making it the third largest in Western Europe after that of France and Britain. By all accounts, Germany will be home to 100,000 Jews in the year 2000.

Recently, I spent nine days in Germany as a guest of the German National Tourist Office and Lufthansa Airlines, and during the course of my travels, I visited several Jewish communities in the eastern sector of the country. In this column, I will write about two of them, Potsdam and Halle.

Potsdam, southwest of Berlin, is an industrial centre on the Havel River, with a population of 140,000. Formerly a symbol of Prussian militarism, Potsdam today is the site of one of the greatest attractions in Germany, Sanssouci, the expansive estate of Prussian royalty.

The manicured grounds are dotted with grand palaces, Roman baths, a Chinese teahouse and a half-timbered country manor house, Schloss Cecilienhof, the venue of the 1945 Potsdam Conference, the purpose of which was to determine the fate of Germany.

Potsdam is linked to western Germany by the Glienicke bridge, where East-West spy exchanges took place during the Cold War. On this stolid bridge, in 1986, Natan Scharansky walked to his freedom from a Soviet gulag.

At Schloss Cecilienhof, now an elegant hotel, I met the leader of Potsdam's Jewish community, Alexander Kogan, a diffident 41-year-old medical doctor from Ukraine who hails from a traditional Jewish family.

According to Kogan, the community had dwindled to all but two souls when he and his family set down roots in 1990. Before the Nazi era, some 430 Jews lived in Potsdam, which was razed by Allied air raids in the final weeks of World War II.

With 250 Jews today, the community has bounced back. Kogan expects several hundred more Jews to come here in the next few years, given the significant number of Jewish citizens from the former Soviet Union who've applied for German visas.

Optimistic about the future, Kogan spoke of plans to build a community centre and a synagogue on land donated by the city. The old shul, devastated by the Nazis and bombarded by the Allies, was demolished in 1957.

Potsdam's Jewish cemetery, though damaged by the Nazis on Kristallnacht, is the only functioning one in the state of Brandenburg. It adjoins the Russian Colony, a rustic neighborhood crowned by an Orthodox church on a bluff.

The gravestones reflect the phenomenon of assimilation, a hallmark of German Jewry. The oldest ones are engraved solely in Hebrew. The newer ones bear German and Hebrew inscriptions. One of the headstones bears the name of Hollander, a family which found refuge in Canada in the wake of Hitler's accession to power.

As might be expected, the community is not without its problems. Although most of its members have university degrees and are professionals, virtually all of them are unemployed and subsist on social security. Kogan, however, is self-employed, and his new BMW sedan attests to his prosperity.

The German economy, the powerhouse of Europe, is in the doldrums these days. But this isn't the only reason for the catastrophic joblessness. "Their skills don't fit the market," explained Stefan Szajak, the director of Frankfurt's Jewish community, who is quite familiar with the issue. The mayor of Potsdam, Horst Gramlich, proffered another theory. Too few of the immigrants, he observed, have bothered to master the German language.

Halle, the birthplace of Georg Friedrich Handel, lies northwest of Leipzig, in the state of Saxony-Anhalt. The city, with a population of 290,000, grew fat on its famous salt springs, which have since run dry.

The Hallmarkt, Halle's imposing market square, is dominated by five steepled towers, the most notable being the medieval Red Tower, which houses what is possibly the world's biggest carillon. By foot, the Red Tower is minutes away from the Handel House, a museum, concert hall and research centre which celebrates the genius of the composer.

Halle's other claim to fame is the late-Gothic Moritzburg castle, which, since 1897, has been a museum and art gallery. During the Third Reich, German expressionist paintings decried as "degenerate" were removed from the premises, but have since been restored to their place of honor.

When the Nazis cracked down on "degenerate" art in 1937, the Jewish community in Halle consisted of several hundred persons. Scores had already left , driven out by persecution.

The synagogue was destroyed on Kristallnacht. In its place now is a yellow brick Holocaust monument. It was erected by the East German government in 1988, on the 50th anniversary of Kristallnacht, at Jerusalmer Platz.

Having been reduced to a remnant of some 50 Jews by 1966, the community has grown to 250 persons today, all but one of whom are from former Soviet republics.

The sole exception, Eli Gampel, is the community's blustery leader. He was born in Stuttgart 36 years ago, the son of Polish Jews. A real estate developer, he settled in Halle in 1989 for business reasons. He met his wife — a Ukrainian Jew — here, and they have two children.

Despite its size, the community lacks little, being served by an Orthodox synagogue, a cemetery, a kosher restaurant and a butcher. Its permanent rabbi was recruited from Israel, with which Gampel has close ties. He served in the Israeli army, and in 1982, he was wounded during the war in Lebanon.

As in Potsdam, the unemployment rate in Halle is disastrously high, with at least one-third of the Jewish newcomers being idle. Nevertheless, 100 new Soviet immigrants are expected to arrive within six months.

Gampel has nothing but disdain for the Reform-oriented community which sprang up in Halle after the war. As he put it, "I have nothing against liberal Judaism, so long as it's not here." With indignation, Gampel claims that the former chair of the community, Karin Mylius, was the daughter of a Nazi official. The story, though bizarre, appears to be true.

Neo-Nazism has reared its ugly head in Halle. In 1992, the cemetery was vandalized, and two years ago, Gampel was shot at by a skinhead. But these events have not inhibited the growth of a new Jewish community.

To the Toronto Jewish Community,

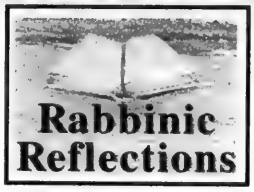
Thank you for welcoming us into your midst. We are grateful that you have entrusted so many of your children in the hands of our committed and highly qualified staff. We are glad to inform you that they learn joyfully, and, of course, success comes with enthusiastic learning.

Our grades SK - 4 are now full for the coming school year. We are however wait-listing new applicants.

Due to increased demand, we are opening a new JK class, so there is room for your four year old.

Please contact us soon, since space might not be available for long.

Contrary to the popular perception, we are not a miracle school, and we cannot handle all students. There is an admission process in place geared to determine whether we can adequately serve your child.



Organizing shul life

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

There are two assumptions with which I begin. First, trends in the United States are not only instructive in themselves but harbingers of Canadian trends. Second, what is true about the majority of churchgoers is equally true of the majority of synagogue worshippers given a similar cultural background and spiritual grounding.

With these two assumptions in mind, I contend that the important analysis in Charles Trueheart's report on what is called "The Next Church" (Atlantic Monthly, 1996) should have a profound influence on the way we organize synagogue life for the foreseeable future.

The Next Church, as the independent and entrepreneurial congregations adopting new contemporary forms of worship and belonging might be called, has become an amazing American phenomenon. There are only 400 such churches in total, but they are the fastest growing type of churches in the United States. At a time when half of American Protestant churches have fewer than 75 congregants, these mega-churches number their members in the thousands.

What makes them successful is their market-driven approach to membership. They offer social services as much as religious services. A sampling of one particular congregation's morning programs includes, a seminar on effective single-parenting, 12-step recovery programs by category, a parents of adolescents meeting, a class for engaged couples, a seniors meeting, a women in the workplace branch, women's Bible study, a baseball league, grief support, music and dance workshops, and a belonging class for new members. The wide range of activities reflects the Next Church's desire to capture a market share in its nets of activities. In one church, the three questions that the leaders continually ask are: What is our business? Who is our customer? What does the customer consider value?

The large size and budgets of these churches allow them to provide the kinds of programs and services that smaller churches simply cannot offer. The ultimate question that these huge enterprises face is how to keep up this torrid pace of growth and tremendous expansion without running the risk of alienation and depersonalization that comes with size.

One pastor, understanding the problem well, responded that churches can get bigger and bigger as long as they keep getting smaller and smaller. He goes on to say that "people come to church to be touched, to belong...we form local congregations as if they were clubs and we behave as if they were clubs."

One way the Next Church achieves this goal is by insisting that all the small group services being provided for people who attend are provided by the people who attend. In other words, membership involvement is critical.

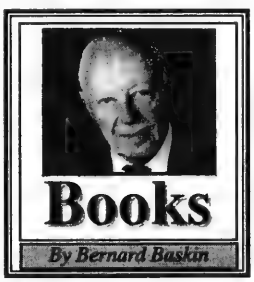
Membership involvement is important from another perspective too. The Next Church has concluded that Americans attend church for different reasons than they did a generation or two ago. Then, attendance was determined by habit and heritage. Now, however, attendance is determined by commitment to what is meaningful. People — especially the young — won't attend out of conformity. They will only attend when they feel a commitment and commitment comes from meaningfulness.

By enlisting members in the service of other members and the community, the church leaders endow people with responsibility and the feeling that they are needed. The feeling they contribute builds commitment, and commitment spells attendance.

There is one final element that is worth considering. The Next Church begins with the premise that you give the customer what he or she wants. But it doesn't end there. Giving them what they want is only the bait to give them what they need and what they didn't think they wanted. And that still remains the spiritual and religious objective.

Rather than find reasons why this prescription of building bigger and better religious institutions cannot and does not apply to the Jewish community, it would be far better to extract those ideas that make good sense and adapt them to the synagogue. There is something here worth learning.

Rabbi Allen is the spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue and past president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.



An amusing tale

Birth, Death and Other Trivialities by Marcel Strigberger (Three Beans Press, California, $14.95).

What makes us laugh? It's a puzzle. Even the philosophers and psychologists don't know. In any case, we all insist that we have a sense of humor. An unknown realist wrote, "Men will confess to treason, murder, arson, false teeth or a wig. How many of them will own up to a lack of humor?" Mark Twain remarked that humor is often the best way to have people take things seriously and that everything is funny as long as it happens to somebody else.

Mel Brooks found a Jewish answer to the meaning of humor. He wrote, "Look at Jewish history; unrelieved lamenting would be intolerable, so for every 10 Jews beating their breasts, God designated one to be crazy and amuse the breast-beaters. By the time I was five, I knew that I was that one." For some perceptive observers, humor is to be found everywhere. Art Buchwald wrote, "Just when you think there's nothing to write about, Nixon says, 'I am not a crook.' Jimmy Carter says, 'I have lusted after women in my heart.' President Reagan says, 'I have just taken a urinalysis test, and I am not on dope.'"

Marcel Strigberger, a practising Toronto lawyer, is a "whimsical humorist" who has performed as a stand-up comic. He has also written humorous articles for national newspapers and legal magazines, and contributed to radio and television comedy.

Birth, Death, and Other Trivialities deals in an amusing and quasi-philosophical fashion with a variety of topics: sex, the meaning of life, the quest for happiness, Bible and religion, lawyers and doctors — and many others. His method is not the crushing one-liner, or biting satire, but brief, discerning essays that reveal the absurdities and paradoxes of everyday life.

Commenting on a widespread human failing, he suggests, "If you want to make your friends happy, put yourself into the hospital with some illness. Show them you're down and out. If, however, you're down and out on your luck and you want to depress your friends, throw a lavish party. Bring on a great show of opulence. This will upset them royally. Notwithstanding the Ninth Commandment, the tendency of human nature is still to covet one's neighbor's wife, husband, manservant, maidservant, donkey, ass and Cadillac. Conversely, the tendency is to feel better if one hears the neighbor has had a setback or two."

On the victory of David over Goliath, Strigberger has his own commentary. "What impresses me the most about the duel was not that little David won...the big trick here was that once Goliath came crashing down with a headache, the Philistines, who vastly outnumbered the Hebrews, kept their part of the bargain and said, 'Okay, we're out of here. Fair is fair. It's cricket.' The number two man could just as well have said, 'Hey, wait a minute. There's nothing in writing confirming this deal.' Lucky thing for the Hebrews there were not lawyers around, yet."

More music on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In the last column of the Jewish Highway, we began our look at Jewish music on the Internet. Today, we continue by looking at music from Israel with everything from classical to the latest popular groups to Jewish rock.

The Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs has prepared a very good overview about the importance that music has played in the history of Israel [http://www.israelmfa.gov.il/facts/culture/fcult4.html].

For the past 60 years, the "Palestine Orchestra" and then the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra [http://www.icl.co.il/p/pilarmon/hisen.htm] has woven itself into the fabric of Israel. From Arturo Toscanini to Leonard Bernstein to Zubin Mehta, the Philharmonic has played under the baton of some of this century's best conductors.

Although it is not as well known as the Philharmonic, the New Israeli Opera has already made a somewhat controversial mark on the country's music. According to its own candid Website [http://www.israelopera.co.il/profile.htm#his] the Opera opened to much local criticism over acoustic problems and questions about its very existence. Apparently the Opera has acted on those complaints and things have calmed down.

If you'd rather listen to some music than read about it, then go to the Israeli-Jewish-Yiddish-Hebrew-Folk-Cultural Music Midi Free Library [http://members.aol.com/israelmidi/index.html]. OK, the name is a bit of a mouthful, but this is a superb library of over 100 popular tunes. You'll find an eclectic assortment of tunes ranging from Erev Shel Shoshanim and Arik Einstein's Uf Gozal to Exodus and four versions of Hatikvah. Speaking of which, you can find sheet music and lyrics to the National Anthem at the Jewish Swedish site appropriately named Hatikva [http://www.algonet.se/~hatikva/anthem.html].

And if you're up for it, take a listen to the very energetic Lenny Solomon, the self-proclaimed "King of Shlock Rock" at J-Rock [http://www.virtual.co.il/music/jrock/]. Lenny plays Jewish tunes like Shalom Aleichem and Emunah (faith) set to upbeat, rock beats. You'll need RealAudio [http://www.realaudio.com/products/player/download.html] to listen to J-Rock.

If you've been inspired by all this music and want to play some of your own, you may want to strum a few notes on a replica of David's Harp [http://www.virtual.co.il/arts/harrari/kinnor.htm]. Micah and Shoshanna Harrari have crafted a harp or 10-string Kinnor based on the kind played in the time of King David.

Harps and inspirational tunes certainly have their place, but they are not what you will normally hear if you turn on the radio in Israel today. To find out about that kind of music, go to Radio Hazak: Israeli Music on the Web [http://www.well.com/user/yudel/f-rwelc.html]. This large site has many interactive areas where you can discuss and debate the best and worst that Israel's pop artists have to offer.

Also worth a visit is Israel Music Online [http://www.geocities.com/SunsetStrip/Alley/5895/]. Despite its name, you won't find any online music here, but you will find links to hit artists Achinoam Nini (Noa), Ethnix and Mashina (mostly in Hebrew.) The SABRA Music Centre [http://www.sabranet.com/sabramusic.html] offers short excerpts of some popular groups. (You'll need the free Internet Wave player [http://www.vocaltec.com/iwave.htm] to hear these music files.)

And if you still are looking for more links about Israeli and Jewish music, then check out both the Jewish/Israel Culture-Link Launcher [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/culture.html#music] and the Maven Music page [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx196.htm].

Oh yes... it would be derelict of me to conclude the column without mentioning the one song most identified with both the State of Israel and hockey game organists — Hava Nagilah [http://members.aol.com/israelmidi/havanagi.mid]. For a history of the song many people love and many others love to ignore, take a look at [http://www.well.com/user/yudel/Havahist.html].

Forget Hava Nagilah? Hora of horas!

Quebec Nationalism: What Does It Mean for the Future of 'Ethnics and Money'?

Sunday, February 23 at 7pm

After former Quebec Premier Jacques Parizeau blamed 'Ethnics and Money' for the Yes side defeat in the October 1995 referendum, the question for the almost 100,000 Quebec Jews still remains an urgent one. Should they start packing their suitcases and abandoning their homes? Should Toronto prepare for a new onslaught of Montrealers?
Our panel of high profile and outspoken Montreal "movers and shakers" share their insights on this vital issue.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Blaming today's kids should be resisted

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The Torah relates that one of Noah's first activities in the aftermath of the Flood is to plant a vineyard and drink wine; he then falls into a state of intoxication. Shortly thereafter, we are told that Noah has shed his clothing in the midst of his bout of drunkenness and that his son Ham looks at the "nakedness of his father."

This brief episode characterizes an essential human tension that is particularly reflective of the fundamental dilemma of contemporary Jews.

Our century has also experienced a cataclysmic destruction — of Jewish millions, at the savage hands of Nazism. One could argue that post-war Jewry is still trying to recover from the effects of the immense devastation wrought between 1933 and 1945. Looking to erect a new existence out of the ashes of the Holocaust, Jews have become successful in many areas of business and professional life; we have planted "vineyards" in an attempt to obtain relief from the awful past and move towards a better future. However, as the great 11th-century commentator Rashi points out, Noah "should have occupied himself first with planting something different."

The result of Noah's action, his lack of discerning analysis about precisely what his first priority should be when forging a new life for himself and his family, is that he is left exposed to the wanton gaze of his son. This is an act that metaphorically conveys a rebellion not just against his father, but also against the idea of his father as an authority, as a guide or a teacher of life. Ham's lack of filial piety may be understandable; he desires to look freely at or into anything. But the price paid for his shameless curiosity is that he can no longer uphold reverence for his father, and for this he encounters the Torah's condemnation.

The choice for Jews today is a difficult one, and in many respects is akin to the position of Ham. As the noted American physician/philosopher Leon Kass has noted, in our generation we have seen how Judaism, too, has been symbolically "uncovered," as many Jews struggle to maintain respect for or pay any heed at all to the tradition of their fathers and mothers. We desire to have little restraint placed upon us, and as fully integrated members of Western liberal democracy we are by now used to questioning and challenging any claim to hierarchy, authority, traditional wisdom. "Uncovering the father" (whether in the sense of our families or other authorities) is almost a natural legacy for us. Respect, honor, awe — the building blocks of religious fidelity — have become increasingly archaic terms in modern life.

In my time as an educator, I have watched as parents consistently bemoan the decline in the values of today's young people and nostalgically point to an earlier time when children knew right from wrong." But blaming today's kids is a temptation that should be resisted; in truth, matters are far more complex.

As parents it is we who often find ourselves choosing the vineyards of Western culture — sports and entertainment; secular schools; professional achievement as the ultimate priority — and it is we who must therefore reckon with the fruit of that vine. Can we allow children to indiscriminately "gaze at everything" around them and at the same time expect them to see as their chief priority — informing and underlying all of their other pursuits — the maintenance of religious values? That is the crucial question we must ask as we step into the next century, and our answers will tell a lot about what kind of Judaism our sons and daughters will plant in the years to come.

Teen years time of great change, Parent Fair told

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Get Out of My Life But First Take Me to the Mall. According to child psychologist Dr. Gerard Klein, this current book title sums up teenagers' attitudes toward their parents.

Klein spoke on The Terrible Teens at Aish HaTorah's recent Parenting Fair, held at the organization's Thornhill facility.

"They want to be separate from you, but they want you to be there for them," Klein explained.

The teenage years, he said, are a time of great change, not just physiological and hormonal, but in terms of sensory and perceptual function.

The rapid mood swings reflect those tremendous changes, when, for instance, even the senses of smell and sight are heightened and can change from minute to minute.

They are also developing the ability to think and argue logically, and practise this new skill on you. "And they are better at it than you are — if they want to argue something with you, just sit down, because they will be better at it than you are."

It is possible to survive teenage children, Klein promised, by following guidelines he summed up as "support, communication, trust and being positive."

Don't always try for the last word, he advised. Decide what is important, and make your stands on those issues. "In my view, if it is not life-threatening, it's not important."

Be open to your teens' concerns, he said. Don't brush them off by saying they shouldn't worry.

As well, be ready and open for those times they want to talk to you, even if it isn't at a convenient time. "They are immediate thinkers," he said, and it is important for parents to be there when they are needed.

Trust your kids, he said. "If they have been taught good family values and there are good family dynamics, they will do the right thing."

On the other hand, he said, trust your instincts. If, after careful observation, you seriously suspect your teenagers are involved in drugs, for instance, take action.

Make sure there is positive interaction between the teenager and the rest of the family, whether it be in the context of the Shabbat table or family meetings, he advised. This should not be a time for putting the teenager down.

Remember, he said, "your teenager will grow out of this [stage]. Ninety per cent of them do well."

Where is the anger over war-time atrocities?

By MICHAEL LEBOVIC

I was just one of many Canadian Jews, I suspect, who tuned in to watch 60 Minutes on Feb. 2. The press had been talking about a special segment dealing with Nazis in Canada. Not that I really expected to learn anything new. I was quite certain I knew it all. I was wrong.

Guest Voices

Wrong about what I knew, and very wrong about what I would feel. I thought I would sit in while Mike Wallace exposed "Canada's shame." I wanted to see what the rest of the world would see. Somehow this exposure would satisfy me. The government would get its comeuppance. The wheels of justice would be jarred loose, to perhaps finally turn towards long-delayed retribution.

Comparatively speaking, this was pretty light Holocaust material, but it left me more shaken than I have been for a long time. This is surprising, since on the face of it, the program didn't tell us anything new. I've always known of the Nazis in our midst; yet inexplicably, I've never looked too closely. These are not the "real" Nazis I told myself. I mean they are, but they aren't....They're probably card-carrying, tattooed flacks. Not actual killers, just haters.

Not so, says Steve Rambam, a brave young man who actually shook off the cobwebs of complacency and went looking for justice on his own. These men, he explains, are murderers whose hands are covered with blood. They stabbed, shot and beat to death countless victims. Why, I am so outraged, I actually move to the edge of my sofa. Someone will pay for this. Something will be done. But I sit back as I am overtaken with a feeling of helplessness.

The most chilling moment in the segment was when Wallace played back a tape of an interview Rambam had with one of Canada's "old men" in British Columbia. The man and his wife calmly related how they organized the shooting of thousands of victims in Latvia. He finished his tale by stating quite matter of factly: "On Nov. 9 at 1 p.m., no more Jews."

This old man died in his own bed last week at the age of 90. He had a full, comfortable peaceful life. According to the Wiesenthal Centre, there are approximately 1,800 of these animals living in Canada. Were each one brought to justice tomorrow, all would have lived the same full life the old man in British Columbia did.

Am I not somehow responsible, I wonder. Why haven't I mounted unceasing protests? Why haven't I wailed and screamed in a most uncivilized manner, until the government said, "Enough, we'll finally do what's right"? Why haven't we all? The Mishnah tells us that a Jew needs "the chutzpah of a leopard." Where is our chutzpah, our anger, our righteous indignation? I'm not talking about organizations now. I'm not referring to committees and commissions. I mean all of us ordinary members of the Jewish community. What makes us tick that it allows us to be so incredibly creative and ambitious in other areas, yet so complacent in this one? Are we so law abiding, do we depend that much upon the system, are we so religious that we look only to G-d for vengeance?

I recognize how busy we all are. There is work, and car pool, shul and shopping, meetings to attend, papers that have to be read, news stations that have to be watched. And then, of course, there are the deadlines. Whether its a job, on a shul committee, taxes, RRSPs, the list goes on and on. Could it be that with all this activity, we've left ourselves no time to think, to analyse, to react? Is this why we're immobile against our sworn openly unrepentant enemies?

Irving Abella recounted Pierre Trudeau's response to his query on government inactivity in this area. According to Abella, Trudeau was quite frank about his unwillingness to take action. He would not risk open conflict, he said, between the Jewish community and other ethnic groups.

Good enough, but why couldn't an effort be made to enlist the help of those very ethnic communities, Ukrainian, Latvian, Lithuanian, among whom these murderers have chosen to hide? Clearly, we are not tarring them all with the same brush. There is no need for hostility when fellow Canadians work together to bring recognized perpetrators of genocide to justice. Somehow I cannot imagine another community being this tolerant.

Only G-d knows why there was a Holocaust. The human mind can barely comprehend those horrors that have been documented. Still, those who perpetrated these acts must pay. There will be a heavenly reckoning of course, but what of the children of Israel and their families whose paths these devils cross. Are we to ignore them?

Every day the newspapers carry another story of national opportunism and wartime theft, of the Swiss, the French, the Americans who "accidentally" bought victims' art. Then there's the German government, which has renounced Nazism forever and has paid out millions of dollars in reparations, yet still pays its aging murderers military benefits.

Here and there is a voice in the wilderness, a Beate Klarsfeld, a Simon Wiesenthal, plus a few other lonely voices straining to be heard. The rest seem to have put it behind them.

I'm not suggesting we don't care. We need only look at all the causes supported by the Jewish community: the Yom Hashoah events, the memorials and the museums. I'm just puzzled by the lack of human response.

I'm not promoting lawlessness, you understand, although an attack on a creature like this would be easily understood. We are a practical people who must weigh the present and future good against an act of revenge for the past. Still, I have to ask, where is the anger? If we can't get angry, how can anyone else?

Michael Lebovic, a child of Holocaust survivors, lives in Toronto.

War of words erupts

courts, strict rules apply" with a strong tradition "concerning limits on pre-trial publicity...media and groups seeking to influence government and public opinion should not comment on the merits of cases before the courts."

Code's second letter did not satisfy Farber or Abella. Code did not retract his suggestions that Congress was involved in contempt of court or in orchestrating the prosecution of Oberlander, they said. "These are totally ridiculous charges and he doesn't deal with them in his letter," Abella said.

In other developments, Federal Court Justice Paul Rouleau has withdrawn from the case involving Oberlander and two other alleged war criminals after he contacted Amerasinghe to discuss scheduling matters.

"I think this is Alice in Blunderland," Abella stated. "Anything that could go wrong in the courts will go wrong."

Last March, a senior Justice Department official corresponded on scheduling matters with the chief justice of the Federal Court. Federal Court Justice Bud Cullen granted a request to stay the proceedings on the grounds of interference in judicial independence, but that decision was recently overturned by the Federal Court of Appeal. Code's letter to Amerasinghe suggested Rouleau's call may be new evidence that he will seek to advance when appealing to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Meanwhile, a report compiled by a special unit of the Immigration Department found that Canada is a haven for at least 250 modern-day war criminals from countries like Somalia, Afghanistan, Iraq and Bosnia. Many have found a home in Canada despite being refused refugee status and despite an attempted government crackdown, the Sunday Sun reported.

CHAT students bring moderation message to peers

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's cool to say no. Taking just one drink – or no drink – is OK, even if you're a teenager.

That is the message students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) brought to children from its feeder schools last fall.

Working in teams of four, 28 youngsters in grades 10 and 11 went to grade seven and eight classes at the Bathurst and Bayview branches of United Synagogue Day School (USDS) and Bialik with a program of discussion groups, role playing, a video and games.

The message was moderation, and being able to make sensible choices, explained CHAT guidance counsellor Joy Cohen.

The CHAT students were taught by Gail Diamond of Parents Against Drugs (PAD), using material from the organization's Challenges, Beliefs and Changes peer education program.

The youngsters made a sizable investment of time, Cohen said, explaining that the training session lasted two full days, and was followed by planning sessions, and then the three one-hour sessions with grade seven and eight students.

The USDS and Bialik students were very responsive, Cohen said, partly, according to reaction reports, because the presenters were close to their age, and partly because they were a link to the schools the younger students would probably be attending.

Also, because teachers were not present during the presentation, "the kids felt freer to talk about their own experiences," Cohen said.

Cohen said CHAT hopes to train another 28 students next year, and send them out to the feeder schools which have expressed an interest in the PAD program. As well, those of the original group who wish to repeat their experience can do so.

It was through Issy (congrats on receiving the R. M. Taylor Award for your long-term support in the fight against cancer) & Rosalie Sharp and Heather Hoffman (co-chair of the festival's Gala) that I got to know about ASHKENAZ '97 and its energetic Fundraising Director Judy Litwack-Goldman and of course, Communications Director, Dianne Weinrib. Let me assure you that if you enjoyed, as I did, the Yiddish luncheons at the old Primrose Club you'll want to be at Harbourfront Centre this summer. Congrats to the Gala's chair Linda Frum on her appointment to the board of the Ontario Arts Council. Watch this space as I continue to name names!!!

Be sure to ask Max Berg about his LMOL annual Valentine Dance on February 15th. Call Sandy Burns at 485-9453 for tickets.

Again, let me wish two of my favourite people, Leslie Dan & Murray Koffler, a wonderful happy birthday. I hear that Moishe's Steak House, of Montreal fame, is coming here by summer and we'll try to do lunch there.

Leave it to Alan Heller of Universal Sound fame to bring some more smiles to our community. Just ask Reena's Gail Israel, D.D.E., about Universal's contribution to 10 years of FUNDAY and two of MARDI GRAS. He and Stewart Sinukoff are bringing some great Canadian comedians to the City of Vaughan, at the CITY PLAYHOUSE . . . on February 14th & 15th, right down the street from Reena's new Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre. Call (905) 709-4057 right now for tickets to these HBO-type specials and have a laugh on me.

What an extraordinary evening of fun and excitement. Thanks to Maccabi Canada's Hockey Committee including Avrom Silver, Gerry Wilks, Frank Simkevitz, Ron Hoffman and Henry Zieleniec for inviting us to the Hockey Hall of Fame in BCE place to celebrate. The 15th Maccabiah Games are in Israel July 14-24, 1997. Reena's 3rd annual Mardi Gras will be held March 29th at the same historic Hockey Hall Of Fame.

Seen recently at United Bakers: Ab Flatt, Ralph Snow, and in that corner, Flory Lebow & Sheila Engel. It was nice to congratulate Canadian Diabetes' executive director, Leigh Parish (taking out some great soup for her family & asking me about one of my pen pals, Liz Taylor) and her chief fundraiser, Jim Bindon on CDA's annual beer bottle empties day take of $177,000. It was started a few years ago with Brewers Warehousing when I had the Wheat Sheaf Pub. I pointed out Charlotte Ackerman and Margaret Sack to them.

As this is being written, Reena staff and volunteers will be caught up in the infectious spirit of the Sixth Special Olympics World Winter Games. Several years ago I was thrilled to be part of the Canadian public relations committee established in the prescence of the games patriarch Sargent Shriver and the late Harry "RED" Foster. Thanks to prez Michael Latimer for keeping in touch. The Oath of the Special Olympics is: "Let me win. But if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt." Sounds like the spirit of REENA!!!

Hey, CJN allowed me 500 words for this piece. the last word in this sentence is number 499.

BBYO maintains strong role for Jewish teens in Ontario

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Youth Organization's (BBYO) largest Canadian region wants everyone to know it's alive and kicking.

Because of a restructuring of the youth group last summer, under which BBYO Canada reverted to American supervision, the former Lake Ontario Region is now called, informally, the tri-council.

The region – essentially unchanged – takes in Ottawa and Kingston; Buffalo and Rochester, N.Y.; and has as its centrepiece the newly formed Greater Toronto Council (GTC), which comprises Toronto and environs, Hamilton, Kitchener and London.

In all, the region serves roughly 350 Jewish teens from grades 8 through 13, divided into Aleph Zadik Aleph (AZA) for boys and B'nai Brith Girls (BBG). About 90 are from outside Toronto. Teen Connection is for boys and girls in Grade 7.

Leaders and members agree it's been a transition year for the Canadian arm of the organization, largely because BBYO Canada ceased to exist last summer due to a budget cut from B'nai Brith International in Washington, D.C.

As well, the position of BBYO Canada national director was retrenched, and three of the four Canadian BBYO regions were reorganized.

At the time, BBYO staff criticized the return to American supervision, saying that Canadian input was being lost.

But BBYO Canada existed, as such, for just three years. Prior to that, members' activities in this country were supervised from the United States, and that's the case again now.

B'nai Brith Canada stopped funding BBYO in 1991. Today, funding comes from membership dues, public fundraising and, locally, a grant from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Recently, a local BBYO delegation, led by Greater Toronto Council director Stefanie Hofland, paid a visit to The CJN's office to bring the public up to date.

BBYO is still the largest Jewish youth group in the world, with some 40,000 members in 1,500 chapters, Hofland noted. Its focus has not changed; the group still stresses Judaic programs, but it also has plenty of recreational, social, cultural and sporting events.

And even though BBYO has adult supervisors, both here and in the United States, the group is youth-led, Hofland stressed.

This month, the GTC sponsored an AZA basketball league. The winner will go on to sectional finals in New Jersey.

As well, a Wednesday night floor hockey league has been resurrected and a parent-teen dialogue in Toronto next month will look at anti-Semitism and prejudice.

The AZA will hold a brotherhood week in late March and there will be dance-a-thon April 5. A May trip to Buffalo is planned.

Hofland said Chabad has agreed to help BBYO with its Judaic programming.

Members are also busy with community work in hospitals.

The region is busy trying to start chapters in Peterborough and Oshawa.

For information, call BBYO at 416-635-9411.

Kosher Second Cup opens at BJC

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The only totally kosher Second Cup in the world is opening Feb. 20 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). It will be under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

To celebrate the event, at which patio tables with umbrellas will be added to the lobby, free coffee and refreshments will be served between 11 a.m. and noon.

"We're so excited about this new service," said BJC executive director Deborah Pinsky. "We're proud to be the first fully kosher Second Cup. The ones in Jerusalem and at Lawrence and Bathurst sell some kosher products. This will be the first Second Cup in any Jewish community centre in Canada.

"We will own the Second Cup operation in the Bathurst Jewish Centre and all profits will go to help us operate our programs here," said Pinsky.

Rabbi Mordecai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council, will cut the ribbon opening Second Cup at the BJC and many dignitaries, including Mayor Mel Lastman of North York, have been invited to attend.

The cafeteria at the BJC will continue to operate.

MADA volunteers get unique experience in Israel

By ROMAN ELINSON

Last summer I volunteered for the Canadian Magen David Adom Program in Israel (MADA). Four delegations of students were sent from Canada: one to Jerusalem, two to Tel Aviv (Tel Aviv and Ramat Gan) and one to Haifa. Each group had its share of unique experiences, but I think I speak for all of us when I say that we definitely got more than we bargained for.

We stayed in absorption centres for olim chadashim (new immigrants) in our respective locations. The Tel Aviv and Ramat Gan groups were put up in the swanky suburb of Ramat Aviv (of Israeli TV fame), just around the corner from the Tel Aviv University. The Jerusalem group stayed in Mevasseret Zion, just outside of the holy city, and the Haifa group spent their summer on the beach in Kiryat Yam.

We had a choice of morning, evening or graveyard shifts, each with its own characteristic charm. Some of us tried our hand at all of them, others stuck to a more regular routine. Many of the calls received were less than exciting, such as transfers to and from hospitals and nursing homes. But there were also shifts that really got our hearts pumping and the adrenaline running, moments that will remain in our memories for a long time. These were what we lived for.

Collectively, we witnessed heart attacks, strokes, asthma attacks, car accidents, motorcycle accidents, scooter accidents, limb amputations, electrocutions, suicide attempts, drug overdoses, broken bones, fires, high falls, low falls, stabbings, beatings, shootings and other traumas that would put any episode of ER to shame.

Make no mistake, it takes a brave heart and a strong stomach to be a medic with MADA. It isn't a picnic to have someone die in your arms after 15 minutes of vigorous CPR and 1,000 volts of electricity. On the other hand, there are few greater feelings than that of bringing a human being back to life — now that's making a difference.

Baby delivery

Our work on the ambulance was not limited to just trauma; some of us were lucky enough to assist in the delivery of a baby. Jay Wohlgelernter did such a good job he was invited to the brit!

There were lighter moments from time to time as well. Frank and Howie can tell you about their call to a wedding banquet where they got fed and received a generous tip for their efforts (all proceeds went to MADA, of course). Some patients had their own sense of humor. Like one not-so-sane lady who came marching into the ER with me arm-in-arm, kissed me and asked the bemused staff, "How does everyone like my new groom?" There also was the strong-constitutional stroke victim who insisted on a glass of whisky instead of the usual oxygen mask.

Besides the action, riding in an ambulance has other perks. You get to part traffic with the siren, go through red lights and drive on the wrong side of the road. You get discounts at the local sandwich bars and falafel stands, and you can blare the Macarena out the loudspeaker on Ben Yehuda Street between calls.

As with many summer programs in Israel, you make good friends, both with the people with whom you come to Israel and the people you meet there. There was quite a bit of camaraderie (to say the least) between the Canadian volunteers and the nahagim (ambulance drivers). We even got to use their "pelefones" from time to time.

Volunteering with MADA is hard work, but you get plenty of free time to travel, visit family or just frolic in the sun. There were two organized trips for the MADA crew, one to Jerusalem and one to northern Israel. Some people took the opportunity to do some travelling of their own, trek through the Sinai, tour Jordan and island-hop in Greece. All in all, the trip was a blast. We left with hopes and expectations and we came back with memories, life experiences, best friends and great resumes!

The Canadian Magen David Adom Program is arranged through the Israel Aliyah Centre.

ANGUISH TO HOPE

A Mission to Hungary, Poland & Israel

for Canadian University Students

In the summer of 1897...
Theodor Herzl, founder of the modern Zionist movement, predicted the creation of a Jewish homeland within fifty years. Half a century later, after the annihilation of one third of world Jewry by the Nazis, the state of Israel was reborn.

A century later...
In the spring of 1997, join one hundred Canadian university students as they travel to the birthplace of Theodor Herzl, witness the despair of eastern Europe's death camps, and the joy and promise of the land of Israel.

In Hungary visit Budapest, birthplace of Holocaust martyr Hannah Senesh, and home to the magnificent century and a half old Donahey Street Synagogue, attended by Theodor Herzl as a child. In Poland take part in the March of the Living from Auschwitz to Birkenau together with thousands of students from around the world. In Israel tour the length and breadth of this ancient yet modern country and celebrate Israel's Independence Day on the streets of Jerusalem.

Be a part of this historic and memorable journey into the past and future of the Jewish people.

May 1-19, 1997

A Canadian student, draped in the flag of Israel, views the haunting monument at the entrance to the Majdanek death camp in Poland.

Fee: $2,895 plus minimum contribution of $100 to local UJA/CJA/UIA campaign.
(Limited scholarships for applicants in genuine financial need may be available in some communities. $2,895 fee is applicable from all Canadian points of origin.)

THE PINEAPPLE INN

The Pineapple Inn, in an old Unionville church built in 1847, has its name from the carved or painted pineapple, the Colonial symbol of hospitality. The pineapple still decorates the walls of the Inn, whose inner appearance resembles a Victorian house with fireplace and pine floors. The Inn offers fine dining, and a menu which respects current trends in dishes like roast rack of lamb, peppered fillet of salmon, or puree of butternut squash soup with ale and cheddar cheese. The atmosphere is casual, hospitable and unpretentious. Come see for yourself: drop in for Sunday brunch; or reserve a room for an intimate dinner party.

I recommend By The Wharf's own Escargot Bourguignonne and our home-made Boston Clam Chowder, prepared fresh daily. A feast fit for a king is the Captain's Platter, a masterpiece which includes one whole lobster, king crab legs, broiled shrimp and Oysters Rockefeller. For meat lovers try our Chateaubriand, Filet Mignon served with bearnaise sauce or our New York Cut, charbroiled, with mushrooms. Top your evening off with our succulent desserts that will make your mouth water.

Call ahead of time and enjoy a specially prepared menu for your party. A banquet room is available for private parties, corporate functions and special occasions. This beautiful room follows the same cruise ship decor as the dining area, and holds up to 75 persons.

Education called key to Jewish survival

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jews must rely on education to survive the turn of the millennium was the conclusion reached in a recent panel discussion at York University.

The program, titled Jewish Identity in the New Millennium: Three Views from Israel, featured three leading scholars in Jewish studies: professors Sergio DellaPergola, Yair Zakovitch and Ze'ev Mankowitz. Each spoke of the importance of Jewish education for maintaining a strong Jewish identity.

Prof. Irving Abella, who moderated the panel, asked whether Judaism in Canada can survive the freedom it has had to thrive into the next century.

"We definitely want to integrate," said Abella. "Yet we are concerned. We want to be able to maintain our uniqueness."

DellaPergola, head of the Division of Jewish Demographics and Statistics at the Institute of Contemporary Jewry, offered a statistical look at the present and future state of the Jewish population. He noted that Israel is experiencing a steady growth in population. Tel Aviv is close to having the highest Jewish population in the world, he said, second only to New York City. If this growth continues, he said, Israel should have a population of six million by the year 2010.

At the same time, world Jewry is experiencing zero population growth, DellaPergola noted, adding that the frequency of intermarriage in the United States has been rising steadily since the 1940s and almost doubling with each decade. He also said that while recent studies suggest that the fourth generation American Jews have an intermarriage rate of 52 percent, other studies suggest that the rate is closer to 70 percent.

Whether the intermarriage rate will continue to grow, DellaPergola said, will depend on "the efforts of communities to devise policies and interventions for Jewish education."

Biblical scholar Zakovitch of the Institute of Jewish Studies spoke on Jewish identity in transition.

Israel, he said, is made up of many groups of Jews. But, he noted, "it is the secular [groups] which worry me the most."

Secular Jews, he said, have "rejected" biblical literature, including midrash and Talmud.

"Some Jews demand a monopoly over Judaism. I don't agree with secular Jews who give up the Bible because others demand a monopoly. The Bible belongs to all of us," Zakovitch said.

He advocated educating Jews in Jewish sources, and in the original Hebrew text.

Mankowitz, director of the Melton Centre for Jewish Education, rounded out the panel asking, "Can education make a difference?"

The greatest mistake one can make, he said, is to put too much pressure on the Jewish school systems as the providers of Jewish education.

As for the future of Jewish education, Mankowitz said, "We have nowhere to go but forward because the solutions of the 19th century will not work for the 20th."

The panel was sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University and the action committee for Jewish continuity of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Fryer wins UJA award for commitment to campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joanna Levitt's assertion that York University student Robyn Fryer recruited about a million people for the United Jewish Appeal's first student telethon is obviously an exaggeration.

But when Levitt, citywide director of UJA on Campus, talks of Fryer's dedication and efficiency, she's perfectly serious.

"She's one of the volunteers you die for," said Levitt. "She's always there, always ready to help. She's outgoing and warm, and extremely dedicated to the Jewish people."

Fryer's contributions were recognized at the recent UJA campaign closing ceremonies held at Beth Tzedec Congregation, when the 22-year-old woman received the organization's first UJA on Campus award.

Robyn Fryer

A fourth-year Jewish studies major, Fryer hopes to pursue a career in Jewish communal service. Having spent her second undergraduate year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and a summer doing Jewish programming at a Michigan camp, Fryer became more aware of the needs of different communities and realized that she "can make a difference."

A member of Beth Tikvah Congregation, Fryer works as a USY adviser at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, volunteers at Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold program for homeless people and for the Canadian Foundation for AIDS research, and is involved in Koach, the campus outreach arm of the Conservative movement. She also works for York's Office for Persons with Disabilities, taking notes for students who are unable to do so.

Fryer is a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for one year before switching to Vaughan Secondary School.

One of three children from "a very close, traditional family," Robyn and her two brothers have "complete respect and support" from their parents Sharon and Gerry, she said.

Fryer has also been influenced by the example of her late grandfather, Max Rosenberg, who supported a number of Jewish charities.

"I know he would have been very proud of me for getting this award," she said.

And just how did she recruit her friends for the telethon?

"I just said, 'It'll be a good time. It's the right thing to do. It makes us feel good that we're doing it.

"This is my future. This is the route I'm going. I want to make a tangible difference."

Orthodox rabbi named as McGill U religious studies dean

MONTREAL — That a Jew, let alone an Orthodox rabbi, could head a faculty whose purpose is, in part, to train Christian clergy is a source of pride to Barry Levy because he sees himself, above all, as an academic.

Levy, 51, is the new dean of religious studies at McGill University, where he has been a professor of Jewish studies since 1975.

"I may be the first Jewish dean in the world in a faculty like this," he said. "I think it's very significant. I think that it demonstrates a true openness that has rarely, if ever, been the hallmark of institutions and faculties of this sort."

Levy takes over from former dean Donna Runnalls. He will oversee about a dozen professors, 170 undergraduate and graduate students (including those in the divinity schools) and an annual budget of $4.7 million. Another 2,000 students from other faculties take religious studies courses.

Levy's biggest challenge will be to defend the independence of the faculty at a time when the university's government funding is being squeezed. Last year, McGill principal Bernard Shapiro suggested that religion might become a department within the arts faculty, as a cost-saving measure.The faculty has already lost some of its teaching staff through attrition.

Religious studies has always had its critics who think a subject rooted in faith, rather than the purely intellectual, has no right to be on par with, say, science or the liberal arts at an institution like McGill.

Levy doesn't agree. He sees a renewed interest in religion and the spiritual and thinks the university should respond to that trend. He thinks it is in society's interest that those who wish to become teachers or preachers of religion be educated in a university. A religious studies faculty combines the necessary academic and professional training.

"It would be very easy to divorce such institutions and say 'Let theological schools go out and train their own religious leaders – they have no place in the secular university.' That's an easy way out. I think that we're all better off if our religious leaders are trained in universities."

And that type of training does not belong in the arts, he maintains.

Further economies might be made by cooperating more with other departments that have courses related to morality or ethics, he said.

A native of Long Beach, Calif., Levy was educated at Yeshiva University and New York University, where he earned a doctorate in Near Eastern languages and literature. His field of expertise is interpretation of the Jewish Bible, and he has worked on a new translation of the Babylonian Talmud due to be released this year.

After a short stint as an assistant professor at Brown University, he was invited by then McGill Jewish studies chair Ruth Wisse to join her department, and he accepted in 1975, expecting to stay a couple of years and go back to the United States.

From 1991-94, he was chair of Jewish studies, which is a department of the arts faculty. In 1992, he won the H. Noel Fieldhouse Award for excellence in teaching.

In 1990, Levy was curator of the exhibition Planets, Potions and Parchments, held at the David M. Stewart Museum, in conjunction with the Jewish Public Library. His coup was in persuading Israel to lend a fragment of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the show.

Levy would like to broaden the faculty's traditional strength in Christian scriptural interpretation to not only that of Judaism, but also Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism and other religions.

CJC-P opposes changing relationship with federations

By MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC-P) "strongly opposes" implementation of a plan that could result in CJC regions becoming beneficiaries of their local federations, declares a CJC-P resolution.

The resolution passed after lengthy debate on a recent proposal made by the Council of Jewish Federations, Canada (CJF).

At present, national Congress operations are financed annually by about $3 million provided by the CJF, which receives the funds from the 10 federations in Canada, with the funding depending on federation campaign results. CJF also funds the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, the Canada-Israel Committee and United Israel Appeal.

National CJC reallocates its share to the regions and each region operates as an individual entity within CJC without overlapping other community programs.

CJC-P is concerned that if the region had to deal directly with the federation for funds, it could become a federation committee and risk losing its clout as the principal Jewish advocacy organization.

Pacific region feels such a change would not necessarily reflect the needs and aspirations of the Jewish population and would make it too reliant on its federation.

Funding of CJF by its member federations is mandatory, according to CJF president, Richard Vineberg of Montreal. He told The CJN in a phone interview that he approves this policy because "it's a national collective responsibility. The policy is my philosophy," he said, adding he's certain it's a philosophy shared by the Canadian Jewish leadership.

But CJC-P's resolution expresses the fear that the proposed transfer of funding to individual federations "will result in a merger of independent regions with their respective federations."

CJC-P chair Dr. Michael Elterman calls CJF "a conduit" for moving funds to the national organization, something he does not want to tamper with. He says that with its national structure closely linked to regional structures, Congress can act as "an effective vehicle for advocacy on a broad range of public policy and social justice issues guided by Jewish values.

Raising funds for the blind at Hebrew U.

By MYRON LOVE

WINNIPEG — Co-chairs Michael Goldberg and Dr. Paul Kowall are hoping to have 300 to 500 people come out for a Comedy Night on March 15, intended to raise money for the Blind Students' Unit at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The evening, co-sponsored by the new leadership division of the Winnipeg chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and State of Israel Bonds, will feature comedians Caryn Bark and Gord Paynter, a blind comedian.

The Blind Students' Unit, Goldberg explains, offers services to assist blind, visually challenged and dyslexic students in overcoming the obstacles they face in the university environment.

Two years ago, the new leadership division hosted over 300 people at another comedy night in support of multiple sclerosis research at Hebrew University. Now a new drug developed thanks in part to the funds raised is being tested by Upjohn Pharmacia at 56 centres worldwide, including one in Winnipeg.

Campaign gears up for museum's Holocaust gallery

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A national campaign is set to begin to raise funds and find war-era artifacts for a new Holocaust gallery at the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa.

The wing, to cost between $2 million and $3 million, will showcase Holocaust-era objects, Jewish resistance during the war, and the contribution of Canadian Jewish soldiers to the Allied cause.

Survivors' mementoes sought

Organizers say it will also take a tough look at the anti-Semitism that drove Canada's immigration policy before, during and even after World War II.

The gallery will be part of a three-storey extension at the war museum, located on Sussex Drive and affiliated with the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull. The addition, to cost at least $3 million, is expected to be complete by 1999.

The Holocaust gallery will be the first such exhibit in a federally-funded museum, although one report last week stated that Ottawa has declined to contribute directly to the wing's construction.

In addition to artifacts, the 4,000-square-foot wing, which is yet to be named, will examine Canada's dismal record of admitting Jewish refugees during the war years. It will also look at the Holocaust's other victims – homosexuals, Gypsies and Communists, as well as contemporary examples of genocide in Rwanda and Cambodia.

The gallery's curator, Fred Gaffen, is asking the public for help in locating artifacts from the Holocaust era, including concentration camp uniforms, photographs, yellow stars of David, ID cards, ghetto currency and other mementoes. He's hoping to persuade Canadian survivors to lend or donate some objects.

Gaffen told The CJN that talks are underway with the Holocaust museums in Montreal and Toronto, which will be asked to lend some items to the new wing.

"We'll be looking for other material too, like valises, clothes and [war] medals from the period," Gaffen said. "We prefer donations, but we're going to have to buy some things."

Gaffen said he may also go overseas to hunt for objects. Seeing actual objects, especially photos of children, can drive the Holocaust's impact home as nothing else, he added.

Phyllis Teitelbaum, who co-chairs the gallery's Ottawa advisory group, told The CJN she hopes that local chapters will soon be established in other Canadian cities, and a national fundraising chair appointed.

She estimates that so far, around $250,000 has been raised from individual donors.

Fundraising for the entire museum addition is being conducted by the Jewish community and the Friends of the War Museum, Teitelbaum said.

"When I visited the [Holocaust] museum in Washington, I thought, 'Canada should hang its head in shame,' " she said. "This now is our baby."

Many ways to be Jewish, Women's conference told

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamiliton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Their common desire for unity brought about 100 women from all segments of the community, including from Toronto, Kitchener, Guelph and St. Catharines, to Adas Israel Synagogue for a one-day conference on Jewish Women: Unity in our Diversity.

They heard a call for the need to listen to one another, "even when we disagree," and for tolerance and acceptance of each other's differences.

"We are a fractured community," said keynote speaker Norma Baumel Joseph, a Concordia University assistant professor of religion and activist on behalf of Jewish women. "We are not all the same and should not presume to speak for one another."

An Orthodox woman and acknowledged feminist, Joseph pointed out that "there are a lot of different ways of being Jewish," but "no one 'right way' of being Jewish.

"We must learn to trust each other," she said. "We must network where we can and build networks where we can. It doesn't matter what you believe. Find a project or issue on which you can work together. That builds trust."

Other panelists included Eva Goldfinger, a secular Jewish humanist, educator and spiritual leader of the Toronto Congregation of Secular Jewish Associations; Phyllis Angel Greenberg, a cantor, guidance counsellor and member of the Reconstructionist movement; and Susanne Kay, executive director of the Israel Cancer Fund.

Each outlined her beliefs and explained how she came to them. The moderator was Ahuva Soifer, associate professor at McMaster University's School of Social Work.

The conference was organized by Na'amat Hamilton Nitsan chapter. In her welcoming remarks, Na'amat president Wendy Schneider thanked sponsors and Hamilton Hadassah-WIZO for sponsoring the coffee break.

The conference opened Saturday evening with a performance by New York actress and writer Judith Sloan of her one-women show, Denial of the Fittest, before an enthusiastic audience of 260.

Campaign launched in aid of disabled

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson and members of the city council recently joined the York South Association for Community Living (YSACL) for the official launch of a national public awareness campaign in support of people with developmental disabilities.

This year, Vaughan was chosen as the venue for the kick-off of the campaign. Jackson issued a proclamation in council designating Jan. 27 to Feb. 2 as community living awareness week in the city of Vaughan.

A national advertising campaign uses billboards designed and developed by Gould Outdoor Advertising and the Outdoor Partnership to convey the message that people with developmental disabilities should be given the opportunity to participate fully in all aspects of their community.

Jenna Martinuzzi, a 7-year old North York Grade 2 student with Down's syndrome, is featured on the billboard campaign with the caption that reads: "Her disability shouldn't exclude her."

Jenna and her mother were present at the campaign launch, held in front of the Vaughan Civic Centre with the billboard as a backdrop.

YSACL board president Rochelle Reingold introduced the speakers and thanked Gould Advertising for its donation, valued at $400,000.

Reingold hopes the billboard campaign, on view for a month at various sites around the province, will raise awareness of the needs of people who are developmentally challenged, she told The CJN.

"It's so important for people to be aware of people with developmental disabilities because these individuals want to be a part of their community. They want to be employed. They want jobs. They want to go to their local schools."

Those that don't have paying jobs can do volunteer work and still make a meaningful contribution to the communities they live in, Reingold added. "The more aware the community becomes, the more likely people will give developmentally challenged people a chance."

She said Jews with developmental challenges in York and other municipalities are often served by Reena, which has a close working relationship with YSACL and Community Living associations across Toronto.

Sandy Keshen, executive director of Reena, which provides residential, counselling and day program services for people with developmental handicaps, said there is a lot of cooperation between the service organizations.

"[Reena's] residential clients might go to Community Living association workshops. We have a reciprocal relationship. Their residential people might use our day programs," Keshen said.

She advised parents who have children with developmental disabilities to contact Reena at an early stage so that Reena can have something in place when those children leave school.

A public campaign that heightens awareness and understanding of the needs of the developmentally handicapped is important because this group tends to get overlooked by the public, Keshen said. "The developmentally handicapped have a right to be included in all aspects of the community."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am trying to reduce the saturated fat in my diet. Is olive oil the best choice for me?

A. It is very important to remember that all oils are 100 percent fat, no matter what type they are, and therefore all should be used sparingly. While olive oil is among the most flavorful oils it is not the least saturated: Canola oil is the oil with the least amount of saturated fat at six percent, compared to olive oil at 14 percent. While you want to use it in moderation, canola oil is the better choice.

Q. My children do not really like regular milk, but they love chocolate milk. Is it okay to give them chocolate milk instead? I worry that they are not getting enough calcium.

A. Yes, chocolate milk is fine to give children, especially if it gets them to consume bone building calcium. Most commercially sold chocolate milk is made from one percent milk; therefore, it is low in fat and the chocolate does not add a lot of additional calories to it. If your child needs the extra calories, add chocolate powder or syrup to two percent or homogenized milk.

Q. Can I rely on foods labelled low-fat or fat-free to be good snack choices for me? I am trying to lose weight.

A. Watch out for nutrition claims on packages. Many of these foods are actually low in fat or fat free but are still packed with calories. Look at the label for both fat and calorie content before choosing them.

Eight panels to begin post-Hebron negotiations

By DAVID MAKOVSKY AND JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

'Continuing in that spirit of cooperation'

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat agreed recently that eight panels dealing with security and other issues will begin negotiating.

"I think this is a promising continuation of the Hebron agreement," Netanyahu told reporters after a two-hour meeting at the Erez junction. "We are continuing in that spirit of cooperation to resolve all our outstanding problems and matters."

"We had a very important meeting," Arafat said. "We discussed the details of the problems we are facing, especially the points which have to be implemented after the Hebron agreement."

The panels, which are called for in the recent Hebron pullback accord, include ones regarding the establishment of a Palestinian airport in Gaza's Dahaniya area, the construction of a Gaza seaport and safe passage for Palestinians between the West Bank and Gaza.

The IDF is expected to head the Israeli side of the talks, since the main point of contention over these issues is Israel's insistence on adequate security provisions to prevent smuggling into the territories and unauthorized entry into Israel.

The "people to people" committee, headed on the Palestinian side by Israel liaison Sufian Abu Zayde, is to promote non-governmental relations between Israelis and Palestinians.

Other talks to resume include those on transferring Israeli excise taxes and other monies to the PA, whose financial distress has emerged as one of Arafat's major concerns. The economics committee is to meet, headed by Arafat's economic adviser Khaled Salam.

Under the 1994 Paris economic agreement, Israel agreed to rebate to the PA tax money collected from Palestinians in the following categories: petroleum excise taxes; VAT; customs; income taxes; and health fees.

It is estimated that the money transferred to PA accounts in Gaza in 1995 included NIS 580 million in VAT taxes; approximately NIS 50 million in customs taxes; approximately NIS 30 million in health fees; and approximately NIS 15 million in income taxes.

During 1995, an estimated NIS 101 million was transferred by the Finance Ministry to the PA, but was deposited in a Tel Aviv Bank Leumi account controlled by Arafat.

Kicking off the talks will be Foreign Minister David Levy and Arafat top deputy Mahmoud Abbas, who head the ongoing liaison committee. Both participated in the Erez meeting. Arafat also was accompanied by Hebron negotiator Saeb Erekat and preventive security chiefs Jibril Rajoub and Mohammed Dahlan.

Israeli officials termed the meeting "constructive" and "very upbeat" and were pleased to hear their Palestinian counterparts saying they believe "the chemistry between the leaders is improving."

Among the other issues raised was Netanyahu's insistence that the PA close any institutions operating in Jerusalem in contravention of the Oslo accords. The premier also called for ensuring that terrorists are promptly apprehended, prosecuted, punished and not released.

Arafat is to go to Hebron next week to celebrate Id al-Fitr and receive Palestinian women prisoners who are to be released there, a senior PA official said.

As expected, Netanyahu agreed to release Palestinian women prisoners arrested prior to the Oslo 1 agreement. Hisham Abdel-Razek, the PA official in charge of prisoner negotiations, said they will be released in Hebron.

The Israeli side also brought up the need to counter Hamas and Islamic Jihad armed groups, warning that progress would depend on reciprocity in these matters. It also called for a complete annulment of the Palestinian Charter, which the PA says it has annulled, and the extradition of killers of Israelis, something the PA has said it will never accept.

RABBI
OHEL LEAH SYNAGOGUE, HONG KONG

Expressions of interest are invited from suitably qualified individuals for the position of Rabbi of Hong Kong's historic Ohel Leah Synagogue. Ohel Leah serves a vibrant multi-national Jewish community of residents and residents. The beautiful, circa 1901 Synagogue building, now undergoing restoration, is located in Mid-Levels, Hong Kong, adjacent to an ultra-modern Jewish Community Centre, which houses a religious school, a Jewish Day School and a lively schedule of recreational and community activities.

Reporting to the Council of Wardens, the prime responsibility of the Rabbi of Ohel Leah Synagogue will be to provide dynamic leadership to a mixed Ashkenazic and Sephardic Modern Orthodox Congregation numbering approximately 250 families and single adults.

The Rabbi will be expected to develop this community to its fullest potential, through active participation in the Synagogue services, appropriate community activities and adult education.

The successful candidate shall have a centrist philosophy and pluralistic approach to Modern Jewish Orthodoxy. In addition he shall demonstrate proven leadership skills rendering Halachic decisions with authority and in motivating adults and children.

Applicants shall have a University degree in an area not necessarily limited to Jewish studies, and have significant and distinguished pastoral experience. Fluent English and excellent public speaking skills are required.

An attractive salary, housing and other benefits package, commensurate with the applicant's background and experience, will be provided.

Applicants are requested to contact Dr. Glenn Frommer, Chairman, Council of Wardens, at the address below, to register their interest in this position.

Jews seek looted diamonds

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Jewish community of Antwerp, emboldened by the renewed interest in Swiss banks and Nazi loot, is trying to recover its plundered diamonds. These could be more valuable than the dormant Swiss accounts, according to an official of the Centrale, which represents the Jews of the Flemish region.

The bid for the diamonds is part of the unfolding picture of how Jewish communities in Western Europe failed to recoup their property after World War II. Recent revelations have focused on France, where the Paris Municipality apparently owns flats that had been confiscated from Jews.

The diamonds may be the most valuable of all looted properties, although the Centrale could not estimate the value of the losses. Diamonds are largely a cash business without adequate records. However, the stolen gems must have been worth tens of millions of dollars during the war era, said the official.

"With one handful of diamonds, you can live for a lifetime," he said.

Gems were taken during raids on the diamond exchange, where the overwhelming majority of the dealers were Jews.

"People had to drop them on the ground and the Germans took everything," the Centrale official said last week.

Even though there is no estimate of the value of the loss, there is evidence of the theft. When some dealers were arrested by the Nazis, they were forced to pay what was called a "guarantee" in diamonds. After liberation, some surviving dealers had empty envelopes returned to them. The Centrale has some of these original envelopes, which show a stamp of the Reich, the name of the raiding unit, the name of the dealer and the number of carats taken.

"We have no indication if some of the goods were [recovered] after the war by American or Belgian authorities or hidden, for example, in Switzerland," the Centrale official said.

The Swiss issue surfaced last fall with the release of one of the "Safe-haven" files — part of the trove of intelligence documents that have been used in the Swiss banks inquiry.

That document, a 1948 memorandum from the Belgian Mission in Germany to U.S. military authorities, said that the Nazis in 1940 took millions of dollars in diamonds and control of 1,200 diamond workshops in Antwerp. The looted diamonds were moved to neutral countries, mainly Switzerland and Spain, the document said.

It listed the names of some of the Germans involved in the diamond transactions, one of whom was still in Switzerland in 1948. The Belgian government then asked the Americans for help in recovering the stones.

It is not clear whether the Americans ever provided official help in recovering the diamonds. Most of the attention had focused on Belgian gold, which had travelled an adventurous route trying to stay ahead of the Reich.

Syria's Assad recovering from coma

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Syrian President Hafez al-Assad recently recovered from a two-week coma, a British newspaper has reported.

The 66-year-old al-Assad apparently collapsed in December, went into a coma and gained consciousness last month after being treated by Russian doctors flown into Damascus, The Sunday Times reported.

At the time, Syrian officials had said al-Assad was hospitalized for prostate surgery.

In recent years, Assad has suffered from heart problems, diabetes and a rare form of leukemia.

His ailing health has resulted in a campaign to groom his son Basher to be his successor. Basher's older brother, Basel, was killed in a car accident three years ago.

Tragedy Above Shaar Yashuv

Cause of 'copter collision may never be known

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — With no in-flight recordings and no survivors, investigators may never fully determine what caused last week's mid-air crash of two transport helicopters in which all 73 soldiers and airmen died, analysts have said.

Security sources said an inquiry commission appointed by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai is focusing on human error as the main factor in the worst air disaster in the country's military history.

The sources said the Sikorsky CH-53 helicopters were circling in close formation along the northern border, waiting for permission to cross into Lebanon, when they collided minutes after takeoff.

Investigators think the rotor of the rear helicopter hit the tail of the lead helicopter, the sources said. One helicopter plunged straight down, while the other spiralled to the ground.

IAF helicopters douse their lights when they enter Lebanon to avoid drawing fire from Hezbollah, but it was not clear whether the pilots had done so yet, security sources said.

"If the suspicion is that human error caused the crash and there's no one to question, it becomes very difficult to reach solid conclusions and recommendations," said Yisrael Yahalom, a former Sikorsky pilot who in 1977 investigated what was previously the air worst disaster, when a CH-53 crashed in the Jordan Valley, killing 54.

Channel 1 quoted an unnamed pilot in the Sikorsky squadron as saying the rear helicopter "simply 'ran over' the leading copter."

Military correspondent Alon Ben-David said, "The only explanation at present is an error on the pilot's part, an error in estimating the distance between the two helicopters, which caused him to approach and to hit the helicopter in front of him."

Human error suspected

There was no flight recorder, often known as a black box.

Mordechai reiterated that the air force is obligated to adopt any recommendations made by the commission of inquiry. He also advised against making hasty judgments.

"Everything that will be demanded of us as a result of the recommendations of the commission of inquiry will be adopted and implemented," Mordechai said in an interview with Israel Radio. "The commission has only just begun. I advise all of us to be patient and not to take any shortcuts. It is important that the process be orderly and based on facts, and not something which is out to satisfy short-term public needs," Mordechai said.

The external commission — appointed outside the air force to ensure against a possible whitewash — is expected to submit its interim results soon. A final report is to be submitted within 45 days.

The commission recently met in Tel Aviv and heard testimony from air force personnel and experts on the CH-53 helicopter.

Preliminary inspection of the wreckage found that the second helicopter hit the tail of the first. IDF Spokesman Brig.-Gen. Oded Ben-Ami said that so far the cause of the collision is not clear.

Nevertheless, evidence seemed to point to human error. Mordechai said there were no restrictions due to the weather and there was nothing to show that it was a result of a mechanical malfunction.

"The mission of the inquiry is not easy. It's very complicated," Mordechai said, urging the media and the public to refrain from speculating how the collision occurred.

"I ask for a display of responsibility and not to go on about all sorts of speculation based on unsubstantiated information," Mordechai said.

Day of mourning

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The country became one grieving family last week, united in a day of national mourning for the 73 soldiers who died in the helicopter disaster. Thirty-four of the fallen were buried on Feb. 6.

The magnitude of the tragedy sent shock waves across the country, as the private grief of the bereaved families and friends affected people everywhere.

The official day of mourning began on Feb. 5 with the first funeral and continued until the evening of Feb. 6.

Festivities were cancelled, all places of entertainment were closed and flags flew at half-mast. Many people lit memorial candles and put black ribbons in windows, at the suggestion of the chief rabbis, who led special prayers in the afternoon at the Western Wall.

Radio and television broadcasts maintained the sombre tone that began as soon as the size of the catastrophe became known. The Histadrut announced it was suspending all industrial action for the day and Egged carried soldiers free of charge. IAF aircraft, except those on operational duty, remained on the ground in tribute to fallen comrades.

All state schools held memorial assemblies at the start of the day. Media attention focused on the Galili High School in Kfar Sava, which lost three graduates in the collision; the Alliance School in Ramat Aviv, which also lost three former pupils; and Jerusalem's Rene Cassin High School, which lost two more graduates in the crash.

"Today is a day of mourning for the whole people of Israel, which lost the best of its sons in the helicopter disaster," wrote Education Minister Zevulun Hammer in an announcement sent to all schools. "The State of Israel lowers its flags on the fresh graves of 73 of its fighters, who fell as one guarding its safety and security."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, speaking at the Tel Aviv funeral of Sgt. Yaron Tsofiof, 20, described the victims as the best of the country's youth. "The whole world looks at the country of Israel, at the unity of the people, and their ability to unite in grief and say, 'Together we will be strong!'" said Mordechai.

Tragedy Above Shaar Yashuv

'I heard shouts from soldiers'

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hananiya Malka was sitting with his wife, Simmi, in their restaurant in Moshav Shaar Yashuv in the Galilee Panhandle when they heard a noise overhead followed by a loud explosion.

"I thought at first it might be a Katyusha or something like that. Then I saw the flames from a house which is used as a guest house for visitors," said Malka.

He ran to the scene — just 30 metres from his restaurant — believing that gas bottles had perhaps exploded in the empty building.

"I started to turn off the gas and electricity and then I saw the wings and rotors of a helicopter sticking out of the building in the midst of the flames," he said.

He was the first to reach the scene and he ran out with a hose thinking he would be able to douse the flames but they continued to pour from the stricken craft and the building.

"There were explosions, apparently from munitions carried by the soldiers on board the helicopter," he said.

"I heard shouts, to my great sorrow, from soldiers who were trapped inside the helicopter, but there was nothing that could be done.

"The flames were so fierce, that with my hose I couldn't do anything, nothing," said Malka.

One of the helicopters had crashed into the empty building. The other had fallen in open land across the road from the moshav in fields belonging to Kibbutz Dafna.

Residents of the moshav raced to the scene, but like Malka were unable to do anything except raise the alarm. Within minutes, Magen David Adom ambulances, fire crews from Kiryat Shmona and IDF rescue teams reached the disaster area to douse the flames and begin removing the bodies.

Boaz Norkin, head of the MDA Northern Region, said 22 vehicles and many volunteers and professionals arrived at the scene.

"The scene was awful, and the worst part of it all was that we couldn't do anything despite arriving within seconds of the accident," said Norkin.

MDA had all available personnel working at the scene and the area was closed by the military.

An officer of the Northern Region fire department said they arrived within seven minutes, but the army only permitted them to approach the fire when all were fully equipped with combat vests and helmets.

Wreckage from the craft was spread over hundreds of metres. The rescue teams used flares to light up the region in the hope of finding survivors who might have been thrown out of the craft.

Moshav residents said the crash had occurred not far from children's houses. Some evacuated their homes for fear the flames would spread while others took shelter. The residents could only stand and watch until the flames had been brought sufficiently under control so they could help in the rescue evacuation.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu attended the funeral at Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem of St.-Sgt. Yonatan Amedi, 20, who was named after his brother killed in the 1976 Entebbe rescue the week Amedi was born.

The prime minister eulogized Amedi. "His name was Yoni, Yonatan. His parents named him after my brother, who was killed defending our land. Both of them are buried on this mountain, in the Holy Land, in the Holy City. Both of them fulfilled their obligations. Both of them served the country, both of them gave their lives."

All that remains, Netanyahu said, "is to cry for them, and think of the things they could have done in their lives, the pride they could have brought their parents and their families..."

Amedi is survived by his parents, two sisters and a brother.

Speaker after speaker rose in the Knesset to pay their respects. Some people found solace in the words of MK Ehud Barak. "The shocking images that visited every home from the television screen hit you right in the stomach," said Barak, a former chief of staff.

"The shocking images of ammunition exploding from broken pieces of the helicopters...the bodies, not breathing, laid out in front of us, in long, long rows.

"All of this we will painfully carry with us until our final days," Barak said, his voice cracking. "A sea of tears flooded the state of Israel last night, among them my own tears. This is a moment of agonizing pain and also a test, a supreme test of our staying power... We are struggling over our very right to live here in peace and security. That struggle will be decided by our steadfastness, by our staying power, by the power to continue not only in moments of success, but also in difficult moments like these...yitgadal, v'yitkadash, shemeh rabah."

Feb. 3

• A parliamentary committee discussed the use of depleted uranium weights by El Al Airlines to balance its planes. The issue surfaced after reports of increased health problems in an Amsterdam neighborhood over which an El Al cargo plane crashed four years ago. Boeing officials told the committee the uranium had been used in full compliance with regulations.

Feb. 4

• Harsh winter weather swept Israel. Snow fell in the Golan and in the Upper Galilee. Hail, sleet and wet snow fell in Jerusalem. Flooding was reported in a number of riverbeds in the south.

Feb. 5

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu cancelled his trip to Jordan because of the helicopter tragedy. He also postponed his meeting with Yasser Arafat. Both King Hussein and Arafat sent their condolences to the people of Israel. Hezbollah and the government of Iran, on the other hand, issued statements rejoicing over the loss of life.

Feb. 6

• Police questioned Justice Minister Tsachi Hanegbi and Shas Knesset member Aryeh Deri for a second time in connection with an alleged political arrangement surrounding the short-lived appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

Feb.7

• As families continued to bury their dead from the helicopter tragedy, the IDF declared a high state of alert in the south Lebanon security zone for fear of attacks by Hezbollah to mark Iran's Jerusalem Day. IDF officials recalled the heavy artillery barrage let loose by Hezbollah against IDF positions one year ago on this day.

Palestinian state seems inevitable

Seeds already planted

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

A Palestinian state is taking shape as the Oslo peace process inches forward. Surprisingly enough, the present Israeli government appears to be adjusting to that reality.

Wth the signing of the Hebron agreement on Jan. 15, Benjamin Netanyahu not only embraced the Oslo formula and accepted Hebron's partition, but grudgingly came to terms with the division of the Land of Israel, tenets he had steadfastly rejected.

Over the next year and a half, Israel has committed itself to three further unspecified withdrawals from the West Bank. And when Israel and the PLO enter into final status talks later this year, Netanyahu will be under increasing pressure to yield additional territory to the emerging Palestinian state.

As of this moment, the Palestine Authority (PA), headed by Yasser Arafat, fully controls eight cities in Area A (3 percent of the West Bank) and, in conjunction with Israel, shares control of Area B (27 percent of Judea and Samaria). In addition, the PA is in charge of about two-thirds of the Gaza Strip.

The Palestinians claim that, under the provisions of the Oslo accords, Israel is eventually obliged to cede 80 percent to 90 percent of the West Bank, as well as more land in Gaza. Israel may well relinquish considerably less territory to the PA than it is presently demanding. But there is a growing consensus among Israelis that, ultimately, the ownership of the West Bank and of Gaza will be shared by Israel and the Palestinians.

In the face of seemingly irreversible facts on the ground and of the imperatives of the peace process, the Likud has begun to adopt a pragmatic approach to the heretofore heretical notion of Palestinian statehood.

Netanyahu's communications advisor, David Bar-Ilan, has floated two trial balloons which have startled and angered Likud party diehards.

Bar-Ilan, known for his hawkish views, said in December that Israel may be able to accept a demilitarized Palestinian state with limited sovereignty. A month later, he declared, "We are probably closer to an entity that will probably call itself a state, because developments point in that direction."

According to Bar-Ilan's conception, such a state could not raise a large army, produce or import heavy arms, form military alliances with rejectionist countries like Iraq and Iran, control Israel's airspace and its water resources and, finally, admit limitless numbers of Palestinian refugees.

Netanyahu has taken a harder line. In a recent interview, he told the Paris newspaper Le Figaro that he could envision a Palestinian state on condition that Israel's interests and security would not be compromised. Subsequently, however, he warned Arafat not to declare statehood, and vowed to strengthen Jewish settlements in the West Bank to prevent the emergence of an independent Palestinian state.

Prior to this, Netanyahu voiced his opposition to "complete sovereignty" for the Palestinians, saying that he preferred "a third way between subjugation and unbridled self-determination."

The policy statements issued by Bar-Ilan and Netanyahu are significant, if only for one reason. Their pronouncements have shifted the political debate within the Likud. Whereas the very idea of a Palestinian state was once nonnegotiable, this is no longer the case. The real debate now turns on the capabilities of such an entity or state-in-the-making.

Be that as it may, the seeds of a Palestinian state have been planted.The Palestinians have acquired territory and widespread international recognition of their claims. They have built a police force and institutions. They have a flag and a national anthem, and soon they will have their own telephone dialing code. And most of all, they have a genuine sense of peoplehood.

In other words, Palestinian statehood seems inevitable.

PANFINANCIAL:

Canada's foremost creative force for innovative tax minimization, wealth-creation and preservation strategies

"The promises of yesterday are the taxes of today," William Lyon McKenzie King mused. Indeed, he was right. Today Canada is one of the most highly taxed nations in the world. Personal and corporate tax rates soar as high as 50 percent annually. Factor in GST, PST, hidden taxes built into the costs of goods and services, and the compounded picture is staggering.

Conservative estimates suggest as much as two-thirds of an individual's income is consumed by taxes. And as if that's not enough, there's additional taxation levied against capital growth upon death. The current 40 percent tax rate is projected to jump dramatically in the years to come.

Someone has to be the leader, the innovator, the force in creating a generation of strategies and approaches to stem the flow of hard-earned dollars streaming into the tax pool. And in Canada, that someone is The Panfinancial Group, spearheaded by president and founder, Gordon Berger; an accomplished author, lecturer and radio commentator, and one of Canada's leading financial strategists. Berger — together with associates Nathan Disenhouse, Raymond Matt, Zale Newman, and Jack Pollak — has built a firm renowned for its progressive thinking.

Described by industry leaders as one of the most creative firms in the Canadian financial community, Panfinancial is without a doubt this country's foremost authority on innovative tax minimization, wealth-creation and preservation strategies.

Driven by an enduring commitment to providing leading-edge financial strategies, Panfinancial has grown exponentially through its integrity, thoroughness, high degree of professional expertise, and sheer creative ingenuity.

Over the past 25 years, Gordon Berger and his associates have dealt with many of Canada's most successful business people: the presidents and CEOs, owners, managers, and entrepreneurs of leading corporations in sectors varying from real estate and retail to manufacturing and pharmaceuticals.

For many of Panfinancial's clients the strategic-planning process involves helping individuals separate their business needs from their personal interests. "Most entrepreneurs have everything tied up in their companies," observes Berger. "Everybody plans for your company. Your banker. Your lawyer. Your accountant. But who plans for you?"

Panfinancial works for both the corporation and, the special personality behind it — working comfortably in conjunction with other professional advisors. "When we first meet a prospective client with an entrepreneurial background, the person and the corporation are indivisible. When we leave, they're extremely divisible and strategically poised for independent growth," Berger assures.

Achieving higher-than-average returns on investments, and making those investments in a way that provides better-than-average tax savings is the unique differentiator behind The Panfinancial Group. "We develop products and approaches that are typically three to five years ahead of the rest of the Canadian market and are often proprietary in nature,"Jack Pollak says.

The firm's mainstays are tax-deferred or tax-sheltered savings, tax-assisted investments, and the reduction or elimination of estate taxes.

In each of these three areas, notes Zale Newman, "we take conventional tools recognized by the Income Tax Act and the Insurance Act, and use them to create new, innovative approaches to minimize tax."

In the area of RSP's, every Canadian knows retirement savings plans are limited to $13,500 annually, but Panfinancial has developed an Unlimited Retirment Savings Plan. This unique approach, explains Nathan Disenhouse, allows a person to accumulate vast amounts of money on a fully tax-sheltered basis, use them in their lifetime without tax consequence, and pass them to heirs or business associates, tax-free.

Similarly, through Panfinancial's tax-assisted investment strategies, Raymond Matt points out, you can use tax money — either corporate or personal — to invest in low-risk, high-potential return opportunities. Serious investments in solid Canadian corporations representing industries targeted by the Canadian government for development and growth.

In the area of estate planning, Panfinancial designs unique life insurance approaches for wealth preservation and investment purposes. "If structured correctly for people who are liquid," says Berger, "we can turn this no-cost or low-cost vehicle into an investment product with very substantial returns. guaranteed and fully tax-shelted."

Given the country's sizeable deficit, our aging population, high unemployment, shrinking manufacturing sector, and fewer revenue sources, tomorrow's obvious tax target will be those who are building or have inherited personal wealth. Panfinancial is at the leading edge of tax minimization, wealth-creation and preservation strategies. A firm legendary for its precedent-setting ideas. Tax-slashing strategies. High-yield opportunities. And dramatic results.

So confident are they in their abilities, Panfinancial will donate $1,000 to the registered Canadian charity of your choice if unable to present a significant tax-minimization idea or wealth-creation idea you have never seen before.

Panfinancial can be reached at: 265 Yorkland Blvd., North York, Ont. M2J 1S5. Fax: 416-499-6540. Tel: 416-499-4222.

G.I.C.s – A LACK OF INTEREST?

As your G.I.C. investments mature, the reality of today's low interest rates really hits home. But take heart, there are alternatives. It takes a little time to understand them, familiarize yourself with their various tax consequences, and most importantly, analyze their differences in risk. But after careful examination, perhaps with the assistance of a qualified Investment Advisor, the exercise is well worth the potential gains in returns.

One of the newest income alternatives is the investment trust unit. Basically, these are trusts similar to mutual funds with assets such as oil and gas properties, mines, real estate etc. whose income is almost entirely passed on to unit holders. In addition, if applicable, tax deferrals such as capital cost or resource allowances are passed on with the result being that after tax returns are enhanced. There may be risks such as commodity prices or changing interest rates, but your Investment Advisor can explain these fully. Investment Trust Units may be purchased like equities and are listed on the stock market. In addition to direct purchase of units, a number of mutual funds have recently been created with the specific purpose of holding a diversified portfolio of investment trust units. Many are ideally suited for RRSPs.

INTEREST IN INCOME?

Seems like everybody is talking about investments that provide capital growth.

Sometimes you need investments that generate regular income. Those can be difficult to find with today's low interest rates.

Now there is a powerful resource available. The mutual fund research professionals at Nesbitt Burns have just published Funds for Income. This comprehensive research report reviews 17 dividend and income funds. While many of these funds do offer potential for capital gain, they are primarily designed to offer investment income.

Don't overlook mutual funds as a source of investment income. They can be the perfect solution to the problem of low interest rates.

Lost in Yonkers a delightful hit for Al Waxman

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With the production of Lost In Yonkers that opened Feb. 4 at the Atlantis Theatre, director Al Waxman has delivered his third theatrical hit in as many years to the Toronto theatre-going public.

This production of Neil Simon's Tony and Pulitzer prize-winning 1990 play is solidly put together, delivering all the laughs, drama, pathos and poignancy that we expect from Simon, one of the modern theatre's most dependable names.

Veteran actor Jennifer Phipps anchors the cast with a notable portrayal of the cane-wielding Grandma, a character made of cold steel and as stolid and unyielding as a battleship. The two grandsons who come to live with her after their mother dies are equally outstanding: Noah and Benjamin Plener of Thornhill, whose absolute credibility as brothers stems from their genuine consanguinity.

It's 1942. Eddie, the boys' father (Larry Manell), leaves them in grandmother's care so he can make money selling scrap iron in the South to pay off his massive debts. Grandma, a German-Jewish refugee who suffered anti-Semitic persecution and lost a husband and two children, is tough on the boys.

She's far more strict and severe than one might reasonably expect the proprietor of a candy shop to be. (The shop is located beneath her walk-up apartment in Yonkers, N. Y.)

The boys' Aunt Bella (Maria Ricossa) is 35 and unmarried; she still lives with her mother. Childish, dimwitted and as warm as her mother is cold, Bella dreams of marrying and having babies to hug as she was never hugged herself. Her mother resents even her simple pleasures like going to the movies.

Aunt Bella (Maria Ricossa) and the cane-wielding Grandma (Jennifer Phibbs). [Tom Sandler Photography]

Then there's Uncle Louie (Robert Smith), a henchman who occasionally must hide out at his mother's apartment. The boys are so unhappy, they want Louie to take them with him on the lam and induct them into his shadowy profession. It's to his credit that he refuses.

Even Gert (Tannis Burnett), the boys' aunt who appears in Act II, has not escaped her childhood without flaws: in her mother's presence, she has a chronic breathing problem that causes her to finish sentences while sucking in air.

With his trademark wit and economy, Simon shows us the hidden love in this emotionally crippled family and makes us see that they are really not so very different from ourselves.

"You want to hear what my truth is?" Grandma declares near the end. "Whatever it is you get good in life, you also lose something."

What makes this a good and relevant play? In part, it's our instant sympathy for these imperfect, vulnerable characters, struggling for love in a world that seems to want to deny it to them. The playwright understands the troubled modern psyche. In showing us an obscure corner of Yonkers, he is holding up a mirror to our own lives, showing us that we may not be so lost as we think.

All aspects of this production please but one. Situated at Ontario Place, the year-old Atlantis Theatre seems a jagged, ill-considered theatrical space.

Hard to get to, hard to feel comfortable in, it is a small theatre without intimacy.

Fortunately, Phipps, the Plener brothers and the rest of this tight cast – aided by two wizards named Simon and Waxman – quickly manage to overcome this difficulty. The result is a highly satisfying, at times even delightful, theatrical experience.

Confiscated Art Displayed In French Museums

Officials of state-run museums in France have made little or no attempts over the past 50 years to return nearly 2,000 works of art confiscated from Jews during the Nazi occupation of France, says a confidential report prepared by France's public spending watchdog, the Cour des Comptes, and leaked recently by the Paris newspaper, Le Monde.

This was "a deliberate and political act to hide the origins of these works and not to try to return them to their owners," said Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary general of the European Jewish Congress, who was quoted in a report by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Museums holding the art include the Louvre, which has 1,878 pieces, and the Musée d'Orsay, which has 85. The works include paintings by impressionists Claude Monet, Alfred Sisley, Pierre Auguste Renoir and Paul Gauguin and sculptures by Auguste Rodin.

French Prime Minister Alain Juppe has announced a commission to investigate the extent of seizures of art and other property looted by the Nazis and France's Vichy collaborationist government.

Meanwhile in New York, the World Jewish Congress uncovered a list of art works compiled by Hitler's henchman Alfred Rosenberg, who personally oversaw the looting of famous collections owned by the Rothschilds, the Wildensteins and David Weill.

A coffee house atmosphere

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Do you remember the 1960s coffee houses where if you felt like it you could join the performers on stage?

Well, for lovers of Yiddish this is happening again at a monthly bash at the Winchevsky Centre on Cranbrooke Avenue in North York, co-sponsored by Jewish Artists Scholarship Society (JASS), which inspired much of today's resurgence of interest in Yiddish.

A gala opening party on Feb. 15 at 8:30 p.m., to be hosted by singer and actor Gloria Valentine, will feature singer Allan Merovitz, comedians Allen Farkas and Michael Lebovic, storyteller Leslie Robbins, actor Howard Jerome, singer Michael Friedman from Vancouver, pianist Nina Shapilsky and Jonno Lightstone with the Hu-Tsa-Tsa Klezmer band.

Valentine is anxious to hear from performers who like the idea of taking part in an informal, cosy coffee house ambience on Saturday nights (416-638-2222).

"Right from the beginning we've encouraged people to show their love of Yiddish, whether in listening, speaking or reading favorite bits," Valentine said.

Those attending the gala Feb 15 are asked to contribute $10 that will also cover further monthly events at $5 per person. Coffee, tea, cold drinks and noshes will be available.

For further information, call Valentine or Morris Winchevsky School, 416-789-5502.

Growth unprecedented, Israeli minister says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN and MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

Israel's growth in the last five years is unprecedented for a western-style economy, according to Israel's economic minister to North America.

"Israel has become quite an economic empire, and is moving onto the list of the 23 or 24 industrial nations of the world," David Rubin said in Toronto recently.

However, he added that Israel has large trade and budget deficits.

"There is a slowdown, firstly because it is impossible to maintain such a high rate of growth indefinitely. Also, North American companies can import without customs and a huge jump in imports results in a trade deficit," he said.

There is a long list of companies which invest in Israel, but the most significant barometer of the country's economy is what is happening on the stock market, Rubin said.

"The stock market is a real indication of investor confidence and there is a tremendous increase in Israeli companies going public on foreign stock exchanges.

"In the six weeks before the Hebron agreement, the stock market inexplicably took off and many companies have turned to the American stock exchange. Currently, there are 93 Israel-related companies being traded in the United States. That is second only to Canada. There are also four Israel-related companies on the London exchange," he said.

Meanwhile at a workshop in Winnipeg — one of six that were held across the country, co-sponsored by the Israel Economic Mission and the Alliance of Manufacturers and Exporters of Canada — Yael Varsano-Barzilay, Israel's trade commissioner to Canada, said liberalization of trade, economic reform, large scale immigration and the peace process have combined to make Israel a very attractive place to invest.

Varsano-Barzilay said economic growth in Israel averaged 5.8 percent last year. The Gross Domestic Product (GDP) grew 4.4 percent; the average income is now $16,000, equivalent to western European countries; and unemployment stands at 6.5 percent.

Varsano-Barzilay said new markets in places like India, China and Russia have been opened up to Israeli exporters thanks to the peace process.

The government, she said, is planning to speed up privatization of government-owned businesses, among them, El Al, the National Oil Company and Zim Israel Navigation. In total, 13 companies are to be privatized.

Israel now has free trade agreements with the United States and Canada, most western European countries. Turkey and the Czech Republic, and is negotiating deals with Poland and Hungary, Varsano-Barzilay said.

She said Israel's economic strong suits are diamonds, electronic products, chemicals and plastics, telecommunications equipment and medical products. She pointed to several areas of ongoing Canadian-Israeli cooperation in health care, biotechnology and telecommunications.

Lloyd Axworthy, Canada's Foreign Minister, also at the workshop in Winnipeg, described the new Canada-Israel agreement as an important building block in the Middle East peace process. "People are more likely to buy into a peace process if they have jobs to look forward to," he said.

Promoting Tourism

The tourism ministries of Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority recently launched a three-week joint advertising blitz in North American cities, aimed at bringing more tourists to the region in the wake of the recently-signed Hebron agreement.

Large newspaper ads have appeared in major cities, headlined with the word "Peace" in English, Hebrew and Arabic, with the subhead, "It's a beautiful sight to see." Inviting Canadians to "come visit our lands," the ads describe children playing in Jerusalem parks, a new spirit on the streets of Bethlehem and smiling merchants in Amman.

"The idea was that, after we reached the agreement on Hebron, to try to show everybody that things are back on track and that we're still a very attractive and safe region," said Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) for Canada. "Israel is working closely with the Jordanians and the Palestinians on various tourism activities besides the ad campaign, such as workshops for travel agents and seminars for tour operators."

Despite rumors that tourism has fallen sharply, Ben-Tzur claims the drop has been minimal. Israel attracted nearly 2.5 million tourists in 1995, a record high, she says. The figures for 1996 show only a six percent reduction, which is "not a serious decrease."

Joint preparations are under way by the three tourism ministries to handle the increased numbers of visitors expected for Israel's jubilee anniversary in 1998 and the Christian millennium in the year 2000.

Named after the woman who turned around to watch the destruction of Sodom and Gomorra and was transformed into a pillar of salt, the boat departs from and returns to Ein Gedi, an oasis famous for its springs. The cost is the equivalent of $17.50 for adults, $15 for youths, $10 for children.

Tel Aviv Museum: Sigmund Freud's grandson Lucian Freud, who is 75 and lives in London, has been described as "one of the greatest figurative artists of this century." An exhibition of his work from the early 1940s to the mid-1990s is at the Tel Aviv Museum of Art.

The museum is also showing some of the graffiti found where Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. Following his death, shocked and grief-stricken Israelis expressed their sorrow by writing on nearby walls.

The graffiti became a symbol of national pain. Gadi Dagon and his assistants documented them through thousands of photos, 13 of which are on display.

Jerusalem brews a Second Cup

JERUSALEM — Second Cup — one of Canada's top coffee retailers — has opened a coffee house in downtown Jerusalem. It is located on Shammai Street, in the heart of the pedestrian-only zone, just off Ben Yehuda Street.

"Specialty coffee bars have limited exposure in Israel," says franchisee Raphael (Raffi) Tsoubari, who, with partner Peter Veres, purchased the master franchise rights for Israel from Second Cup. "This new location has had a strong, exciting start and it's clear that Second Cup will be extremely successful here."

Synagogue woven into texture of Barbados' history

By NANCY WIGSTON

Barbados' Kaal Kadosh Nidhe Israel. [Nancy Wigston photo]

BARBADOS — Tony, our cab driver, is lost. You wouldn't think Synagogue Lane, just a few blocks from the major stores on Broad Street, would present a challenge, but Bridgetown's historic synagogue was only recently brought back to life. Finally, stopping for directions, Tony smiles and gives us the 'thumbs up' signal.

Kaal Kadosh Nidhe Israel (the holy scattered congregation of Israel) prove worth the search. A neoclassical jewel, with pink coral walls two feet thick, the building forms part of the Barbados Heritage Trust. Inside we find graceful columns, lacey lattice work, pews fashioned from gleaming Barbadian mahogany. Some features, like the clock, are original. Others, like the chandeliers, mimic the originals. Reflecting the proud achievements of a congregation that numbered 800 by 1750, this synagogue is woven into the very texture of Barbadian history.

No one knows for sure if Jews first brought sugar to this island, but a letter to the Earl of Carlisle concerning crop yields survives from 1628, the year after the British arrived. Abraham Jacob is the signatory.

Famed for its warm climate and cooling trade winds, the British colony was soon welcoming Brazilian Sephardim fleeing the Catholic Inquisition. The local archives contain a pass issued by Oliver Cromwell in 1655 to Dr. Abraham de Mercado and his son, from the city of Recife.

Surrounding the synagogue today are tombstones dating from those early years. The oldest, from 1685, bears the name of de Mercado's son, David, credited with introducing a new type of sugar mill to the island. Inscribed in a multitude of languages – Hebrew, Portuguese, Spanish – the graves make for fascinating reading. Bordering many, like afterthoughts, are inscriptions in English.

For hundreds of years, the Jewish community prospered In 1831, Barbados granted Jews full civil and political rights, the first British possession to do so. But the terrible hurricane of the same year not only destroyed the synagogue (rebuilt in the "chaste and classical" style) but also devastated the island's sugar-based economy. Emigration ensued. By century's end the Jewish presence had dwindled.

In 1929, the sole remaining active Jew in Barbados, Edmund Baeza, sold the synagogue, which was then deconsecrated. Though the graveyard had been leased for a 100 years to the Jews of Barbados at a "peppercorn rent," it seemed Jewish history on the island was at an end – if it wasn't for Moses Altman.

In 1932, Altman, a Polish trader, was bound for Venezuela with his family when he saw the British flag waving over Bridgetown and disembarked. After he wrote home to his friends and neighbors urging them to come, a new Jewish community was born, and the graves tended once more. James ("Jimmy") Altman, Moses' grandson, remembers cleaning debris from the stones one afternoon when a stranger dropped by to chat.

"Come see me when you visit my city," the man said as he left. It was Teddy Kollek. When, a decade back, the government proposed the old synagogue be destroyed, Henry Altman, Moses' son, objected vociferously.

With help from worldwide Jewry, the campaign to save Nidhe Israel, chaired by Henry's son Paul, was a stunning success. Today the building stands as a monument to the efforts of Barbadian Jews to preserve the oldest synagogue in the Caribbean.

Although the 1654 building opens for services during the winter season (it can be visited year round), a new synagogue also welcomes visitors. Tony found the Rockley temple, a bungalow called True Blue, without asking for help. It was early December. The air-conditioners were whirring, the accents were West Indian. We settled into comfy plastic chairs. After services, we mingled with residents and visitors and munched on latkes, apple cake and breadfruit.

"Delicious," said Tony, tasting his first latke. Laughing, he thanked us for showing him part of Barbados that was steeped in history, but quite new to him too.

AWARD OF MERIT

The Canadian Wood Council recently announced the winners of its annual design awards program for excellence in wood building. The Award of Merit was presented to Mary Jane Finlayson architect of Toronto for her design of a home on Howland Street in Toronto. The construction of the home was completed by Steven Kirsch of Kirsch Construction of Toronto. The winners were chosen from a total of 109 entries from across Canada.

NHLers named to Maccabi hockey squad

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the wave of his hand and the greeting, Shalom, Jacques Demers declared himself "the best Jewish coach you've ever seen."

Well, if not the best, then certainly the first "Jewish" coach of Canada's hockey entry in the Maccabiah Games. Demers, a two-time NHL coach of the year, will be behind the bench when the best Jewish hockey players from Canada take to the ice for the first-ever hockey competition at the 15th Maccabiah Games in Israel next July.

Demers was at the Hockey Hall of Fame last week, along with a glittering assortment of hockey celebrities, to promote the event and to raise money for Maccabi Canada's hockey entry. Hall-of-Famer Jean Beliveau, Toronto Maple Leaf defenceman Matthieu Schneider, former Leaf captain Darryl Sittler and Montreal Expos part-owner Mark Routtenberg were among the celebrities present, as were a who's who of the Maccabi Canada organization. The event was emceed by Ken Daniels of Hockey Night in Canada and the Fan 590 Radio.

If Demers' enthusiasm, determination and confidence are catching, then Canada's entry in the competition should do well. The games "are important to me because I'm a winner," Demers told the crowd. "When we land in Toronto or Montreal, I want us to land with the gold medal."

Demers will coach a team that will likely consist of Junior A and college calibre players, with a healthy smattering of professionals that will give the team instant credibility. Demers announced that Calgary Flames' "character player" Ronnie Stern has agreed to captain the team. Other pros who will lace 'em up for Canada are Chicago Blackhawk Steve Dubinsky, Florida Panther David Nemirovsky and his brother Mikhail, who's playing in the IHL. Other names mentioned as likely participants included Aaron Brand of the St. John's Maple Leafs, Todd Simon of the Detroit Vipers of the IHL and Michael Henrich of the Barrie Colts of the Ontario Hockey League.

For Demers, the chance to coach at the Maccabiah Games presents a challenge and "I like challenges." He said his involvement with the team began when he was approached by his friend Sam Eltes, who has ties with the Maccabi organizers. Eltes had mentioned his name as a possible coaching candidate for the team, and when he approached Demers, it didn't take long for Eltes to convince him to come on board. Besides enjoying the challenge, Demers was curious about Israel. His aunt had been to the Holy Land twice and raved about the country, so he wants to see it as well, Demers said.

For Beliveau, a visit to Israel will be a chance to renew acquaintances. In 1985, he served as Maccabi Canada's honorary chef de mission. He'll reprise that role again this summer and he said he still holds dear memories of the Maccabiah experience 12 years ago. "It's such a great event. [When] you see and talk to the youngsters who go over there, it's a very good investment," he said.

Holder of 10 Stanley Cup rings in a glorious NHL career, Beliveau said he retired too early to represent Canada in international tournaments. It's something he always missed, but "I'll always remember stepping in front of the 256 [Canadian] athletes [as they entered] Ramat Gan Stadium," he said.

Getting the hockey team to those emotional opening ceremonies was one of the raisons d'etre of last week's fundraiser. Routtenberg, who serves as chair of hockey for Maccabi Canada, said the team is entirely self-financed and will require an estimated $200,000. Maccabi Canada intends to send 35 hockey people to Israel, including 22 or 23 players, as well as doctors, trainers and coaches.

Prior to last week's event, Maccabi Canada was "40 percent on the way" towards reaching its financial goal, Routtenberg said.

Owner of the Hull Olympiques of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League, Routtenberg said he planned to approach all Canadian NHL teams to seek their co-operation by lending personnel to fundraising events. The Toronto Maple Leafs, he said, had been very cooperative, with both Sittler and Schneider attending last week's event, he pointed out.

In addition, the corporate world is being approached for contributions, and last week Routtenberg announced that Bauer and Itech had agreed to fully outfit the team. The team's new sweaters were also unveiled, featuring a design that combines Canada's red maple leaf with the blue Star of David.

The players vying for the right to wear that sweater will gather again in mid May for the final training and evaluation camp in either Hull or Ottawa. Should the Canadiens be eliminated by then, Demers, a Habs scout, will be on hand to help with the player selections. Otherwise, it will be under the supervision of Olympiques GM and governor Charles Henry.

Twenty-one players made the cut after the last evaluation camp, held in Toronto about a month ago. They'll gather, along with about 25 pros, junior and college players for the final cutdown. Demers and Henry will be aided by Charles Thiffault, a former assistant coach with Demers in Montreal. Thiffault, coach in Rouyn-Noranda, will be Demers' right hand man in Israel.

Among those expected at the final camp is 16-year-old phenom Cory Pecker of Lac St. Louis Midget AAA Lions, who, if he continues to develop, could be a first overall NHL draft pick, Henry suggests.

As in World Cup competition, the United States could well be Canada's main stumbling block to a gold medal. That team will be headed by playing coach Mike Hartman, a former NHLer with the Buffalo Sabres, Winnipeg Jets and New York Rangers. The Americans are expected to rely heavily on NCAA players, Henry said.

Russia and Israel round out the hockey event, which will be played on the Olympic-sized ice surface in Canada Centre, a recreation facility built in large measure with Canadian funds provided by the United Israel Appeal.

Roy Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada, said 300 athletes will represent Canada in a variety of sports at the games. While they naturally strive for excellence, for Maccabi Canada "the bottom line is the development of young people who come to Israel with us. We want to nurture a sense of pride in Canada and a sense of pride in Israel. That's what we're all about. It's about young people, it's about pride."

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I've been looking for a job and I'm not having any luck. I feel lousy and I'm sure that whoever I speak to these days can see how discouraged I am.

Dear Reader,

You can't feel good every day and there are many days when you are job hunting that you will feel lousy. Being unemployed is like riding a roller-coaster of feeling – sometimes you are high and sometimes you are low and you never really know what's around the bend. Knowing you are on a roller-coaster ride, however, is a little different because you know when you're going to get off. Unemployment isn't like that.

When you're unemployed, expect the unexpected. Give yourself time to deal with your negative feelings because they will come. But make sure you do something useful with that time. The most useful activity is one that includes some sort of physical exertion.

Self-motivator Tony Robbins says that because we're human, we're bound to fail some of the time and it's those people who know how to deal with failure who succeed in the end. If we consider failure as simply a learning experience then we're succeeding in anything we do.

What we need to do is learn the tools of reframing the messages we hear and giving ourselves new messages. I prefer to let all the negative messages accumulate because each one brings me closer to a positive. In the meantime, I give myself positive messages and repeat these messages to myself until I believe them. I say things like "I have worth" and "My time and energy have value."

Reading a book like Shad Helmstetter's What to Say When You Talk to Yourself will teach you a great deal about giving messages to yourself that help you believe in yourself.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

ASPARAGUS SALAD WITH RASPBERRY VINAIGRETTE
WE SELL JENN-AIR FOR LESS

2 lbs. asparagus, cut into 1" pieces
1 large red bell pepper, seeded and cut into 1" pieces
1 medium red onion, chopped
1/2 cup raspberry vinegar
1/2 cup water
1 tblsp honey
1 tsp. parsley

Steam asparagus pieces for 2 minutes. Plunge into cold water to stop cooking. Drain. Place asparagus, red pepper and onion into a plastic bowl (with cover). Blend vinegar, water, honey and parsley in a separate bowl; pour over vegetables. Adjust seasonings if desired (may want to add more sweetness). Stir, cover and refrigerate for at least 24 hours. Stir occasionally. Yield: 4 servings.

Time for some real-life Jewish sitcoms

By JORDAN MAX

As full-time working parents, my wife and I don't often get to watch a whole lot of television. However, when I do get the rare chance to watch (assuming I don't want to watch Barney or Winnie the Pooh videos for the umpteenth time), I watch sitcoms. Now, if you watch enough sitcoms, you begin to notice two things: first, that no one actually works in these shows, and second, the prevalence of Jewish names in the credits. If only these writers' talents could be put to better use writing real-life sitcoms/dramas with some Jewish content. Here are a few ideas for some mid-season replacements.

Coronary Street: The Jewish equivalent to Cheers, the delicatessen where everyone knows your business. The regulars all come in to eat, shmooze, argue, do deals and be seen.

Yes, Gabbai: A sitcom based on the world of shul politics. To be followed by the sequel series, Yes, Mr. Vice-President and Yes, Mr. President.

Quantum Leap of Faith: Follow the adventures of a yeshivah student who is sucked into the Internet due to a freak accident with his computer modem, and is sent around the world to "leap into" and rescue fellow Jews from assimilation, apathy and high fat diets. He is guided in his travels by the Surfer Rebbe. Will he ever return home, and will his dinner still be warm?

Assets and Liabilities: The accounting version of L.A. Law. This action-drama gives an inside view of the exciting world of a modern Jewish accounting firm. (It's a wonder this hasn't been done before.)

Phantom of the Bimah: The story of a newly ordained rabbi in an old shul that is haunted by the ghost of a deceased chazzanic wannabee. The phantom causes numerous hilarious mishaps until he is finally allowed to lead services on Kol Nidre. He then decides to stay to help increase the membership, while secretly training a young boy with chazzanic ambitions.

Max Giver, PF: A new action adventure series about a mercenary who takes on the fundraising jobs no one else will do. Using only his creativity, daring and that first-year psychology course he took in university, Max Giver convinces the most reluctant persons to become big donors.

Abe Watch: An action-drama series featuring Abe, a middle-aged beach lifeguard (go figure) who becomes a baal tshuvah but decides to keep his job. Catch the excitement as he patrols the public beaches for drowning swimmers and immodestly clothed bathers. Features lots of slow-motion action rescues and cover-ups , but no close-up shots. (Credits to M.R. for the idea)

Called to the Bar: Based on the innovative format of Murder One, in which we watch a young boy and his family go through the ups and downs of getting prepared for his bar mitzvah celebration over the course of an entire year.

Day School 90210/DeRashi Junior High: A sitcom/drama about a Jewish day school, its teachers and students, as they struggle with a double curriculum load, class rivalries, Rashi and lipstick. Also deals with parental struggles to pay for it all and epidemics of metacarpool tunnel syndrome.

Well, I've thrown down the proverbial gauntlet. Are there any script writers out there?

Miller captures wild west

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – First prize red ribbons adorn his walls, but woodworker Morris Miller, 72, will not sell any of his creations, which include the Half-Moon Saloon, a recreation of a wild west bar that took six months to do.

"When I die, my wife can sell any of it she likes," said the 6-foot retired pharmacist, a member of the Earl Bales Senior Woodworking Club.

The Half-Moon Saloon, which includes a preacher trying to convert a drunk on the balcony above the bar and a cowboy sliding down a bannister, has won two red ribbons already. It will shortly go on display at the Earl Bales Community Centre.

Born next door to the Darcy Street Shul, son of the late Abraham and Sarah Miller, the prize-winning craftsman is a sterling example of how active and useful a life a senior can live. His recreation room on Heathview in North York is full of trophies won for golf and tennis. He is a sailor and a ham radio enthusiast, and has even found time to appear as an extra in three movies, State of Shock, with Peter O'Toole, Mutations and Starship Invasion.

His wife, Helen, their children Glen and Marsha, and his sisters, Bella Sherman and Emma Goldstein wonder how he does it.

The piece which has won him more red ribbons than any other, titled Hidden Forest, is made of 30 different woods. It depicts deer and other animals in their leafy surroundings.

"I'll never give that one up," he said. It rightly occupies a place of honor.

His fellow club members at Earl Bales have watched Miller's painstaking work on Full Moon Saloon with admiration, knowing that a couple dancing on a revolving table, shaped from a single block of wood, took three weeks to complete. The bar has 50 liquor bottles, six barrels, three dogs, six animal heads and 23 people, including a card shark with an ace up his boot, as individual pieces. Like all respecting wild west bars, it has a coat rack on which to hang drunks and a table loaded with a free lunch.

Syrian talks on hold

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

President Bill Clinton gestures as he leaves a joint press conference last week with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the East Room at the White House. The key subject of discussions between the two was Israel-Syria peace talks. [Reuter/RNS photo]

WASHINGTON — The United States is not yet prepared to bring to Syria proposals discussed with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for restarting negotiations, a senior U.S. official said late last week.

"We'll continue to explore what ideas will form the basis for the resumption of talks... The prime minister's visit has not yet produced the magic formula to advance," the official said.

In a speech to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy last Friday, Netanyahu said that if talks resume, "obviously we will take note of" Damascus' previous discussions with the Labor government, but he added that he "cannot be bound by speculations and theories and hypotheses" from those talks.

A member of Netanyahu's delegation said that in the premier's meeting with President Bill Clinton, Netanyahu stated that he would resume the talks on the basis of three elements: the U.S. letters of invitation to the 1991 Madrid peace conference, the "general basis" of UN resolutions 242 and 338, and "taking note" of previous Israeli-Syrian talks.

The term "general basis" does not mean it is applicable to territorial compromise on the Golan Heights, the Israeli official stated. Prior to Netanyahu's visit here, the idea that such compromise might be possible had been suggested by others, including Foreign Minister David Levy.

Responding to Netanyahu's visit to Washington, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara said last weekend in Cairo that Israel was running away from peace and that Syria was willing to resume peace talks, as long as they started where the previous round left off.

"There is no Syrian obstinacy, as Netanyahu claims, and Syria is not distancing itself from the peace process or its elements as some

Nazi prosecutor seeks return

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The former head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit wants to get back into the business of prosecuting Nazis.

Bill Hobson said he's made an offer to the department to rejoin the unit as a consultant or senior advisor, or as a lawyer contracted to handle a case.

"I've had a lot of experience in the litigation field. I want to come back as a 30-year litigator," he said.

Hobson said circumstances have changed dramatically from the time in August 1990 when he felt compelled to resign in order to send a message to the unit's political masters.

"The unit is in a position now, in terms of staffing and support from the people above and the support of the Minister, to do the things I said could be done in 1989," said Hobson.

'Attitude roadblocks' have been overcome

Hobson, who headed the unit for three years, believes the "attitude roadblocks" that paralyzed the unit back then have been overcome and that the unit is capable of registering successes. That's a far cry from the situation when "I left...in circumstances where I was a critic of the unit."

Hobson said he was frustrated over the direction in which the unit was heading when he resigned. "It happens when you, as head of a unit, have a vision for it...I felt there were people senior to me who didn't share my opinions and views that there [were] a number of cases that should be investigated and should go forward in a short period of time."

A seminal event that helped prompt his resignation took place in December 1989 when he gave a news interview during which he said the unit was investigating 35 cases, 18 of which had been named by Justice Jules Deschenes in the confidential section of his 1986 report. Despite getting the prior approval of then justice minster Doug Lewis, Hobson was unprepared for the "hostility" he faced from others in the department.

NO LIMIT TO IMMIGRATION, MEIR SAYS

"There is no limit and will never be a limit," Israel's Prime Minister Golda Meir said in response to a question about whether the increased immigration of Russian Jews would weaken Israel's economic infrastructure to the breaking point.

The question and answer essentially summarized the findings of the extraordinary economic conference in Jerusalem convened by Meir to discuss the immediate and long-range economic problems of Israel with regard to mass immigration of Soviet Jews.

VOTE FAVORS RENEWAL OF EDUCATOR'S CONTRACT

The membership of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto affirmed its support of Rabbi Ben Hollander by a vote of 369 to 365. A difference between Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg and Rabbi Hollander over educational methods led to a dispute. Initially the trust company hired to conduct the vote reported the results as 540 to 234 in favor of retaining Rabbi Hollander. The Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail reported this incorrect vote. The trust company said they had mistakenly assigned 131 proxy votes to the wrong column.

Toronto mourns 'best of our sons'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Seventy-three yahrzeit candles, seventy-three photographs of faces of the dead.

That's what hundreds of mourners saw as they filed into the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue last week for an hour-long memorial service for the 73 Israeli soldiers killed Feb. 4 when two helicopters collided over the northern town of Shaar Yashuv.

As Israeli Consul-General Jehudi Kinar pointed out in his talk in Hebrew, Shaar Yashuv has exactly 73 families, each of which "decided to adopt the family of one of the fallen soldiers" in the wake of the worst military accident in Israel's history.

Most of the dead were between the ages of 19 and 21, he said, and many of the older victims were officers. "They were the best of our people, the best of our sons. They came from all over the country, from the south and from the north. They included new immigrants and the sons of veteran kibbutznikim.

One of the soldiers had been a recent immigrant from Ethiopia whose parents had lost 12 other children before arriving in Israel. Another had arrived alone from England two years earlier and had enlisted voluntarily.

Yet another, born days after the Entebbe rescue, had been named in memory of Yoni Netanyahu, brother of the present prime minister who was killed during the mission; they are buried in the same cemetery, the crowd was told.

Although factionalized by politics and religion , Israeli society has been united in mourning the tragedy, Kinar said. "Last week, everyone set aside their personal opinions, and Israel became what it always has to be in order to withstand the challenges facing us. Israel became united as a people."

Kinar read an editorial from the Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv, written by Ya'acov Erez which described the anguish that many Israelis endured upon hearing of the calamity: "This night you searched for them. First, your own children. Afterwards your friends, and then their friends, and their children, and the friends of their children. An entire nation trembling by the phone.

"These are the moments when Israel is not a nation. It is a shared home."

> 'Israel is a shared home'

Hassida David of the Israel Educational and Cultural Institute,who "led" the memorial service, called on Rabbi Philip Scheim, IDF Brigadier-General (Reserves), Doron Kadmiel and Major (Reserves) Yehuda Marley and several others to offer remarks. Most of the service was in Hebrew.

Rabbi Scheim drew a parallel between the fact that the Shaar Yashuv tragedy occurred during the month of Adar as did the series of suicide bombings last year in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Ashkelon. Because the holiday of Purim falls in Adar, it is traditionally considered to be the harbinger of happiness and joy. Rabbi Scheim pointed out the obligation, albeit the difficult one, of "seeking Jewish joy notwithstanding the cost of Jewish survival."

Brigadier-General Kadmiel read the IDF standing order of the day from Chief of Staff Amnon Shahak-Lipkin urging everyone to do what they could "to strengthen the hands of the families that have suffered such heavy loss."

Major Marley read a message of condolence from Rabbi Israel Landa of Chabad. "We will not only light a memorial candle to the memories of the fallen, but we will, ourselves, become a candle which brings light in their memory."

Cantor Yehuda Rotner sang K'El Maleh Rachamim and other mournful hymns, and a trio of singers sang the Hebrew ballad, Mah Avareich (What Kind Of Blessing Can I Give A Child?) Two students read the poem, Everyone Has A Name, in Hebrew and English.

"When something like this happens, it touches everybody in Israel," David told The CJN. "It reaches into every kibbutz and every village and every place in the country. We're all hurting."

Both Kinar and David told The CJN that they know of numerous people in Canada who lost friends and cousins in the accident.

Israelis jarred by mention of crash scene in Scripture

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Was the helicopter crash that killed 73 Israeli servicemen foretold in the Scriptures?

That is the question on the minds of many Israelis, who were more than a bit unnerved to find a reference to the name Sha'ar Yishuv — the northern farming settlement over which the Feb. 4 crash took place — in the preceding week's Haftorah, the reading from the Scriptures that accompanies the weekly Torah portion.

The passage, in Isaiah 7:3-4, reads: "Then said the Lord unto Isaiah, Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou, and Sha'ar Yishuv thy son... and say to him, Take heed, and be quiet; fear not, neither be faint-hearted on account of the two tails of these smoking firebrands."

Some believe that the "tails of these smoking firebrands" is a direct reference to the two helicopters that collided in mid-air and then caught fire.

Although some religious figures said the passage foretells the crash, others were quick to downplay what they admitted was a more than passing coincidence.

Gary Shapiro, faculty chair of the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, expressed the opinion of many Israelis. "I don't reflexively reject anything," he said. "However, I think we have to be very cautious about drawing a one-to-one correspondence between biblical verses and real-life events.

The campus world

In this column, I bring to the readers' attention two unique student publications in Toronto: Dorot and Images.

In addition to the labor and dedication that are poured into the publications, their most outstanding features are the obvious energy and commitment that flow from them in the refreshing manner so reflective of the enthusiasm and creativity that is special and infectious among students struggling with challenge and change.

Dorot is a contemporary Jewish literary journal. Last week I attended the official launch of its second issue.

It is a slim, modest journal of poetry, fiction, non-fiction and photographs. But despite its 30 pages, it packs a punch, at times iconoclastic, at times poignant.

Sidura Ludwig, a student at York University, is its editor. Ludwig was The CJN summer intern last year in our Toronto office. She has a love for writing that is evident and ever prevalent in her work.

Dorot describes itself as an "innovative, provocative literary journal" that seeks submissions from university students...

"We want pieces with Jewish themes — that means anecdotes about your insane relatives, poetry about chicken soup, informal essays on the chaggim — anything Judaic!" Ludwig says.

"Dorot is the Hebrew word for generations. We want to show the public the talent of today's youth. Help us spread the strength of today's generation."

In an interesting irony of the launch last week, doubly acute because unintended, the journal's name was lent an added metaphorical dimension. The launch was held at the Joseph and Minnie Wagman Centre of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The strength of the young generation was indeed spread, but in a manner respectful and obliging to the oldest generation.

The occasion was, in a sense, trans-generational, bringing forth a morning of newness and discovery in the twilight of the fully mature and fully expressed, as if giving living expression to the injunction in Leviticus: "Mipnai sayvah takum, v'hadarta p'nai zakein." Rise when you are in the company of an older (and therefore wiser) person; and give honor to the presence of an elder.

With a staff of four, and through the co-sponsorship of the Zuckerman Charitable Foundation and the Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, Dorot provides an opportunity for university students who seek their meaning and their expressions in the experience of writing. It is a wonderful opportunity for students and a wonderful opportunity for us, their parents, to glimpse their campus world.

Thirteen authors and photographers are published in volume two of Dorot. We shall reproduce the poem of one of them.

It is a full-fledged college newspaper, usually more than 20 pages in length, which appears every few weeks. It provides a range of articles from news stories, features, opinion and commentary and is a forum for the coverage of issues and events concerning the Jewish student community.

Because Jewish students in Toronto attend a far-flung geography of post-secondary campuses including U of T, York, Ryerson, Seneca, and George Brown, the voices one reads in Images are diverse and eclectic.

Its editor Jessica Pelt, is a student at the University of Toronto. Like Ludwig, Pelt also has an involvement with The CJN. She coordinates our monthly feature entitled Campus News and Views.

Images is published by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto with the support of its member campus organizations. It enriches campus life for all those students who pick it up and who inevitably find in its pages the exercises and activities at which students are very good: creative works that inform, entertain, amuse and provoke.

Wherever campuses exist, students will find vehicles of expression. If there are none to be found, they will create their own.

We, their parents, can be proud.

To borrow a phrase from the late brilliant poet and author, A.M. Klein, in their inventiveness, curiosity, energy, enthusiasm and inquiring minds, these young student writers "shine like phosphorous at the bottom of the sea."

In the glow of that shine, we not only see them, but we can gain newer glimpses of ourselves as well.

Canada's voice absent in peace debate: Spector

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is making "virtually no contribution" to peace in the Middle East, charges a former Canadian ambassador to Israel.

As well, "Arabists" at the Foreign Affairs department have for a long time shown "a systematic bias" toward support for Arab positions, Norman Spector told a synagogue audience last week.

Spector, who served as Canada's ambassador in Tel Aviv from 1992 to 1995, said Ottawa's Mideast policies "fall way short of the standard set by [former Prime Minister] Lester Pearson."

Canada's efforts are not only "relatively ineffectual" but "counterproductive" to Mideast peace, charged Spector, who was recently appointed publisher of the Jerusalem Post. He takes up the position this spring.

Spector, Canada's first Jewish envoy to the Jewish state, repeated his oft-stated view that Jews are unwelcome in the foreign service. "Arabists" have "monopolized" the Middle East desk at Foreign Affairs, "and have gone so far as to advise Jews to make their careers elsewhere."

He conceded that under his tenure, Canada-Israel relations advanced, citing the free trade agreement between the two countries, which came into force Jan. 1, and the lifting of the embargo on Canadian arms sales to Israel.

But the free trade agreement, a "no-brainer" first proposed by Israel in 1987, took so long to get off the ground because it was strongly opposed by pro-Arab bureaucrats — an opposition that continues as "strong, evident, consistent and sustained" on a range of Israel-related issues.

And Spector belittled Ottawa's other efforts, calling the Mideast peace talks' Refugee Working Group, which Canada has chaired since 1992, "a sideshow."

Canada briefed Norway on one round of talks held in Oslo, "and to our ever-lasting embarrassment and surprise, the Norwegians were negotiating the Oslo accord right under our noses. They pulled off the diplomatic coup of the decade, if not the century."

Former Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin did not consider Canada a player on the Mideast stage, Spector said. Ottawa owes "what little role it does play" to the Likud government of former Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, which asked Canada to chair the refugee talks.

The time for politeness is over, he said, and he called on Canadian Jews to press Ottawa to change its Middle East policies.

Spector's talk was presented by Beth Emeth Synagogue, the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and B'nai Brith Canada.

Jewish leaders, businesses join trade mission to Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Meetings with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Ezer Weizman are confirmed for Canada's biggest-ever trade mission to Israel, from Feb. 21 to 27.

International Trade Minister Art Eggleton will join the leaders of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), and at least 54 business leaders on the trip, which will see the signing of several joint business ventures.

The goal of the Israel 1997 Business Mission is to inaugurate the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA), which came into force Jan. 1, and opens doors for Canadian businesses wishing to export their goods to Israel.

The mission will focus on, but is not limited to, seven main areas arising from CIFTA: agri-food and fish; high technology; telecommunications; medical, pharmaceutical and health care; construction and building; paper and forestry; and transportation.

In addition to meetings with Weizman and Netanyahu, meetings are slated with Israel's trade minister, Natan Sharansky; infrastructure minister Ariel Sharon; communications minister Limor Livnat and transport minister Yitzhak Levy.

Participants will also lay a wreath at the Mount Herzl gravesite of slain Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Eggleton will preside over the official opening of Canada's new embassy in Tel Aviv. It moved in December.

Delegates will take part in a Canadian trade show to introduce their firms to the Israeli market and will open the Canada-Israel Joint Economic Commission at Israel's trade ministry.

Also scheduled are talks with the Palestinian Authority's minister of trade and economy, Maher Masri, and Palestinian business leaders.

Canadian companies represented on the trip include: Bombardier Inc.; Magnasonic Canada Corp.; Pixcom Communications; Spar Aerospace Ltd.; and SNC-Lavalin International Inc.

York students hold successful 'Israeli' party

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A recent Saturday night party — Israeli-style —went so well that organizers at York University have planned a second one for early March.

About 130 people, a 50/50 mix of Israelis and Canadians, showed up Feb. 1 at the Open-End pub at Vanier College to socialize and dance — sometimes in circles, holding hands — to both Israeli and Canadian music. (A second party will be held at the same location March 8.)

"I think this is one of the best initiatives we've had this year," said Pearl Gropper, Jewish Student Federation (JSF) director. "There was such a positive feeling."

Her enthusiasm for the program, planned by two Israeli students, stems largely from the bringing together of two communities — Israeli students and their Canadian Jewish counterparts — which have for the most part remained separate. In addition, the party represented a new way of reaching out to Israeli students and bringing them together with each other.

In fact, said Gropper, there were a lot of new faces. "You don't hear from them, but they're there."

Ron Salamon, 20, a sociology student who organized the party with psychology student Ilan Gordon, 25, has a foot planted firmly in both cultures. An Israeli who moved here with his family nine years ago, he speaks English with no trace of an Israeli accent, and has both Israeli and Canadian-born friends, although he generally sees them separately.

In his experience, the two groups have preferred not to mix.

Salamon had had no connection with the JSF and had even thought of starting his own group for Israeli students, but decided to check out the existing group after hearing about a Hebrew speakers' club that Gordon had initiated.

The club served as catalyst for bringing more Israeli students into the JSF and breaking down barriers between Israelis and Canadians.

Now the JSF's Israel Affairs chair, Gordon, who came here four years ago after completing his army service, organized the Hebrew speakers' club under the auspices of the student organization.

The first meeting was hilarious, he recalled. About 25 students, both Israeli and Canadian, showed up to discuss things about Israel that strike Canadians as strange, and vice versa.

"When an Israeli comes here," said Gordon, "he stands in line for the bus, he's alone, he looks back and sees this straight, perfect line of people. It's the strangest thing."

The group has consciously avoided political issues, noted Gropper. "This is just to celebrate Israeli life. The emphasis is on cultural and social programs."

Lawyer apologizes to CJC for contempt remark

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyer Michael Code has apologized to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) for suggesting the organization was in contempt of court when its representatives appeared on a CBC television documentary that focused on his client, alleged Nazi war criminal Helmut Oberlander.

"Based on information that I now have...I have been assured that neither Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee, nor Bernie Farber, national director of [community] relations for the CJC were referring to the particular facts of the Oberlander case in the remarks they made to CBC reporters.

"The language of my Feb. 4 letter has been taken to suggest the CJC was 'participating' in a contempt of court. Based on the information I now have, I have offered my sincere apology to them and to the CJC for any embarrassment or offence," Code stated.

Code's retraction was contained in a letter to Justice Department lawyer Chris Amerasinghe, a copy of which was filed in the Federal Court. A similar letter was sent to Congress, but "it's a private letter and we're treating it as such," said Keith Landy, Congress' honorary legal counsel.

Landy said Congress is satisfied with the apology and is now treating the matter as closed. He pointed out that both Abella and Farber "are seasoned people with regard to dealing with matters before the court. They know not to deal with specific cases and they know how to bring the views of the Jewish community to the public and the government with regards to the war crimes issue. They would never make any comment on specific cases before the court."

Code's complaint about the two Congress spokespeople stemmed from a recent CBC television documentary titled The Oberlander File. It focused on Oberlander's alleged role as an interpreter for a Nazi killing unit and the way the charges were perceived by the German and Jewish communities in Kitchener-Waterloo, where he now resides.

CBC lawyer Dan Henry has denied suggestions the network was in contempt, saying the report would not affect the fair adjudication of the issues before the court.

Code's Feb. 4 letter alleged that the CBC was in contempt because it dealt with the merits of the case against his client. He also criticized federal authorities for launching the Oberlander case "with a barrage of media publicity...Conducting litigation by way of press release...casts grave doubt on the attorney general's ability to carry out his duties with the historic neutrality...The appearance given by the press release was of a minister who was catering to the very interest groups who are now participating in contempt of court, together with a publicly funded broadcasting network."

The Oberlander case has been joined with those of alleged Nazi war criminals Erichs Tobiass and Johan Dueck to facilitate the resolution of preliminary legal issues the cases share in common. The cases have been before the courts for approximately two years with no end in sight.

Conscience lost

Two of the major American news networks, NBC and CBS, have turned their cameras and their lights upon Canada's indefensibly feeble record in not ridding itself of the alleged Nazi war criminals who found shelter within our borders. (The question of how and why they found such protective shelter here is not part of this specific discussion.)

The spotlight and the heat the topic has cast in the vastly larger American mainstream appear to have embarrassed Canadian authorities in a way that neither the CBC nor Jewish groups ever could.

But embarrassment brings no satisfaction; only concerted, swift and determined action can.

To be fair, Attorney General Allan Rock has been more active than any cabinet minister before him in initiating legal proceedings against the alleged Nazis in our midst. That his actions have not been crowned with success is deeply regrettable. But we cannot lay the persistent, disheartening, dragging failure at his feet.

That failure stems in large part, incredibly, from an institutionally ingrained attitude that says: "Let bygones be bygones;" or "Fifty years is a long time;" or "Let the 'old men' merely live out the last days of their miserable lives forgotten and in obscurity."

Such an attitude is perverse. We oppose it abjectly with every ounce of our strength. It violates two fundamental tenets that Canadians hold dear and upon which we base our society: conscience and justice.

Perhaps a measure of local perspective will drive home the point more forcefully. As we have written before in this space, imagine if every man, woman and child in Newfoundland and Labrador, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and half of Alberta had been murdered systematically, brutally, callously and coldly by an organized group of evil thugs and their many accomplices. And imagine, too, if the majority of the killers were never brought to justice even though the remaining Canadians and many others knew the killers' identities and whereabouts.

As long as the killers lived, and Canadians knew where, would Canadians not attempt to bring the killers to justice? Would not conscience and justice demand that we bring the killers to account for their crimes?

Every man, woman and child in Newfoundland and Labrador, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and half Alberta.

Would Canadians not expect other like-minded, democratic, law-abiding peoples to understand their cause and indeed to help them in that cause?

As long as the killers lived, and Canadians knew where, would we ever say, "Let bygones be bygones;" or "Fifty years is a long time;" or "Let the 'old men' merely live out the last days of their miserable lives forgotten and in obscurity?" After five years? After 10 years? After 50 years? After any number of years?

Is it conceivable that Canadians would simply yield their consciences to the inconvenience of the passage of time? Is it conceivable that Canadians would simply shrug their shoulders in impotence and watch justice be defeated by injustice?

Canadians would pursue the killers to the ends of the earth because we know that conscience compromised is conscience lost. We also know that justice is more than a debt we pay to victims. It is the minimum standard by which we live our lives and in which we find praise and pride for our society.

"Zionism has already brought about something remarkable, heretofore regarded as impossible: a close union between the ultra-modern and the ultra-conservative elements of Jewry. A union of this kind is possible only on a national basis."

Debating the society we want

Your editorial commentaries of Jan. 30, "Mega-week in Ontario" and "Less drama, more thought," provided a welcome antidote to the assault on the citizens of Ontario by the "mega-week" announcements of the provincial government. Together with Rabbi Gunther Plaut's column of the same date, "Helping the less fortunate," they also give the basis for a response from us, as Jews, to a campaign with far-reaching implications.

We have a particular responsibility because for us there is no separation between religious ideals and the principles by which we should conduct our life, individually, and especially communally. In other faiths, it may be possible live a principled life in isolation from others, but Jews do not have this option. To be a good Jew is to be actively involved in the issues of social justice and concern for others. If we disdain "politics" as a somewhat sordid enterprise and distance ourselves from it, we leave the field open to people who may not bring a principled approach to an endeavor which is, in essence, about how we decide to live together as a society. This is a pity on two counts. Not only do we deny ourselves the opportunity to be truly human, as our tradition defines it, we deny the larger community our unique insights and experiences.

In one sense, Mike Harris and his government have done the people of Ontario a favor by sparking a debate on the kind of society we really want. Jews should take an active role in the discussion.

The Bible is more than stories

Re: "Many Youth Alienated" (Jan. 16). When I read articles like this, I feel that the people who are attempting to teach our children cannot see the forest for the trees. If the story of Abraham, Isaac, the circumcision, the covenant, is not told against the backdrop of the practices of the Babylonians and the role of human sacrifices in the religious life of all other nations, then it is merely a story. If our children are not taught of the courage it took to turn our back on the practices that other nations hallowed, then the Jewish Bible is merely a collection of stories. Similarly, if the Sabbath is taught only within the context of not turning on the electric light, then our children are poorly taught.

In a world divided between two distinct classes, the slaves and their masters, Judaism took mankind's first step towards freeing slaves by giving the slaves a day of rest. The next giant step was taken when it was decreed that men must be paid for their labor and the hours of labor were to be regulated. Without knowing this, the rest is merely a story, that is soon set aside.

I feel our children are being poorly taught about the glories of Jewish history.

Forest Hill hockey teams face anti-Semitism

Your article "Anti-Semitic insults mar hockey tournament" (CJN, Jan. 30), says that "for many of the boys [representing Israel in Bulgaria] it was their first taste of blatant anti-Semitism," because they have played mostly in Canada.

Your readers should be aware that such incidents are commonplace in Canada when one team is distinctively Jewish. It is rare for a season to go by for Forest Hill hockey teams, who play against teams from Toronto and vicinity, without at least one anti-Semitic incident. I was present at such an incident within the past week, where Forest Hill players were called "dirty Kikes." Trash-talking is increasingly common in sport, but you needn't travel to eastern Europe to have it degenerate into racial slurs; 14-year-old Canadians are quite fluent in the language.

Debate rages as to how to respond to such comments. Alon Eizenman, in his report from Bulgaria, expresses pride in the fact that he and his teammates brawled with their Yugoslavian taunters, and "taught them a lesson in manners." His coach "upbraided the youngsters for fighting," but some of the players regarded a violent response as a matter of self-respect. Forest Hill players likewise aren't sure whether an anti-Semitic taunt is grounds for physical reprisal or yet another occasion for practising self-control.

The answer to the X-Files question

I read in The CJN an article by David J. Litvak from Vancouver. He wanted to try to find out if David Duchovny from The X-Files was Jewish. I have the truth to set his mind at rest.

The unofficial biography of David Duchovny states that his father is a Russian Jew and his mother is of Scottish descent. Therefore, he is not Jewish, as it all depends on one's mother's background.

Perspectives

Our national history begins with music

By CHARLES HELLER

Recently, a correspondent to the Jewish Chronicle of London wrote that he was astonished that a London synagogue spent thousands of pounds on a chazzan and choir, "when there are dozens of other projects desperate for that kind of cash." I am sorry he felt so bad about it, but for anyone who responds to music, the matter is not astonishing at all. We need music; so of course we need musicians.

There will always be people like that correspondent who ask, "Why do we need music?" Well, as Louis Armstrong said, "If ya gotta ask, you'll never know."

But let me try to answer the question anyway. In the words of Toronto musicologist Bryan G. Levman: "The importance of music in key social situations" such as public ceremonies and religious services, "shows the deep conviction that all societies in the world have that music can share and transform experience, invoke and commune with the spirit world, and set this world in its proper order."

In simpler words, music affects us. Some people are only slightly touched by it, while for others, music, like all the arts, is an essential part of everyday experience. One Holocaust survivor said that the music played in Terezin was more important than the rotten food: "Music reminded us we were human beings."

Jewish national history begins with music. At the crossing of the Red Sea, Moses and the Children of Israel burst into song, shirah. The Shabbat when we read this episode is called Shabbat Shirah (which this year fell on Jan. 25). Jewish Music Month in North America is traditionally ushered in by this Shabbat, and many synagogues and communities arrange special musical programs around this time.

Jewish leaders have encouraged music ever since Moses. A synagogue service without chant and song is impossible. Over the centuries, there have been countless innovations, many requiring regularization through specific decrees of the rabbis. But the impulse for musical development could never be completely stopped and so gradually our liturgical music has become richer and more varied.

The Chassidim especially valued music. Rabbi Nachman of Breslov said, "A Jew must dance or sing or do something joyful every hour." In fact it is largely through their music and stories that the Chassidim have become accepted and influential in our time. Before 1945, the Chassidim were dismissed in some circles as superstitious and uneducated, but their status today vindicates the prophetic remarks made by Buber in 1907: "To find new life in our time Judaism will have to assimilate chassidic elements."

The Chassidim themselves never doubted their role. When the Breslover Rabbi Nosson sang Aishet Chayil on Friday nights, he would add his own chorus: "Unser sheynkait un unser groyskait vet men visn az Moshiach vet kumen." (Everyone will know our beauty and our significance when the Messiah comes.)

Jews have of course been prominent music makers throughout history, from King David down to Sondheim, Blitzstein and Bernstein, not to mention Mendelssohn, Mahler and Schoenberg. Now these last three represent a particular paradox: the Jewish artist who has to reject his Jewishness in order to enter the mainstream of civilization. All three converted to Christianity, but each had his own brand of faith that was never fully accepted by the Christian world. Mendelssohn retained a lifelong attachment to Jews, both Reform and Orthodox; Mahler embarrassed his Christian singers by telling them to pray as Jews do, "wrestling with the angel." Schoenberg actually re-entered the Jewish community, his last few compositions being solely on Jewish themes.

The painting, Musicians, by Mané-Katz, captures in broad, expressive strokes how some people took to heart Rabbi Nachman's admonition: "A Jew must dance or sing or do something joyful every hour." [Sotheby's Important Judaica Oct. 1996]

This paradox of the alienated Jewish artist (which the re-establishment of the Jewish State has, we hope, ended for ever) is encapsulated in two remarkable statements. In 1921, Schoenberg had worked out the method of serial composition and he remarked, "I have discovered something which will assure the supremacy of German music for the next hundred years." But even this was said slightly tongue in cheek, for he was fully aware of the precarious position of Jews in Germany.

As for Mendelssohn, he was responsible for the revival of Bach's St. Matthew Passion in 1829, which marked the reinstatement of Bach's work as the foundation of Western classical music. Mendelssohn wrote: "To think that a Jew-boy must revive the greatest Christian music for the world!"

The alienation of Jewish musicians is a complex story. Not only was the music of Jewish composers considered degenerate by many, but Jewish entrepreneurs were also edged out to the margins of society, which gave them an affinity for other rejects. Thus it is not surprising that the struggling Beatles were given their first encouragement at Hessy's music store in Liverpool; while in Chicago, blues artists got their first break through independent record producers such as the Chess Brothers, who signed Chuck Berry and Howlin' Wolf. It was a Jew, Alan Freed, who was the first DJ to play "black" R&B music on a "white" radio station. And because performing musicians themselves have been universally regarded as anti-social, their ranks have always been filled by those largely kept out of mainstream society, such as Jews and blacks.

During Jewish Music Month we focus specifically on Jewish music. But what exactly makes "Jewish music" Jewish? People argue endlessly about this. I once heard a distinguished speaker tell his audience that the question was silly and unanswerable, but the audience had come out of their way on a snowy night to hear him speak; so obviously the question has meaning and deserves an answer.

Some people think anything written by a Jew is Jewish music. (Under this definition we would have to include Irving Berlin's White Christmas.) Others think you can recognize Jewish music by its sound: if a piece of music has that sound, it's Jewish, and if not, then it's goyish. This method of identification would be very convenient if it were true, and would save a lot of arguments. Unfortunately, it is completely false. It developed in the early 20th century, largely influenced by half-baked theories of "race" and the desire of each country to have its own "national music."

The definition I prefer is: Jewish music is music intended for a Jewish audience. Jewish Music Toronto has a policy of ensuring that its concerts include a certain minimum proportion of "Jewish music," defined as being by a Jewish composer or having Jewish content. This would include, for example, Yiddish folk songs arranged by non-Jews such as Ravel, as well as chamber music by Mendelssohn.

There seem to be two kinds of reaction to Jewish music — some people think: "Oh no! Not more Havah Nagilah!" and refuse to listen. Then there are those who expect that, since Judaism is 4,000 years old, Jewish music must equally be "archaic" and "exotic." The former tend to have a limited knowledge of Jewish culture but an extensive education in Western culture; the latter tend to be Jews or non-Jews with only a romantic notion of what Judaism is all about. The truth is somewhere in between.

Jewish music covers vast reaches of time and space. I like to think of it as a museum of rare and beautiful things picked up along a journey through history and kept safe for posterity. At its core is Torah chant (trop) and prayer chant (nusah ha-t'fillah), some of which is 2,000 years old. Medieval pilgrims gave us the hymn Eli Tsiyon; Polish dancers gave us the lilt of the mazurka for our zmirot; while Baroque composers left their mark on Sephardi liturgical music. In the last century, the Russian masters influenced Jewish composers of the "St Petersburg School" who created highly artistic work based on their own discoveries in Yiddish folksong. This was something new —profoundly Jewish material presented with the finest Western technique, a style that continues to be explored by Israeli composers today.

Celebrate Jewish music in 1997, Mendelssohn's 150th yahrzeit, by thinking about these questions: Do you agree with critic Max Brod that "the Jewish note" is heard clearly in his music? Or do you agree with musicologist Abraham Idelsohn that there is "not a single element that bears Jewish features?"

Or why not be more musically active and join a choir near you, wherever you live? Every major centre should have an opportunity for singing in a synagogue or community choir. (If it hasn't, why not start your own?)

Last November, I was at a gala CBC choral celebration attended by amateur singers from all over Canada. The host, Howard Dyck, made a memorable comment: "Choral music creates a sense of community." The Jewish community has been singing ever since it crossed the Red Sea and now it's your turn to join in!

Charles Heller is choir director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in North York, and is vice-president of Jewish Music Toronto. He is also a consulting editor for the Cantors Assembly of New York.

Opinions

Ridding the earth of Hitler's shadow

With the war just about 50 years over, three great books have appeared, Gerhard Weinberg's The World at War, his Germany, Hitler and World War II and Richard Overy's Why the Allies Won, and while very different in outlook — the first two by a former German Jew, the other by an Englishman — on the crucial point they say the same thing: Hitler almost won the war.

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

France was beaten, England alone, the United States not ready and, what with Hitler's surprise attack, the Soviet Union had lost, in the first half-year, four million men; 8,000 aircraft, many on the ground; 17,000 tanks, to say nothing of more than half its steel and coal, and its Ukraine "bread basket." Truly staggering figures!

The young may think we naturally won, and even we who lived through it all never knew how close a call it was, but as Overy writes, "The conflict was poised on the knife edge in the middle years of the war. This period must surely rank as the most significant turning point in the history of the modern age."

Then why did we win? To quote Overy again: "The battle of Stalingrad depended on the desperate, almost incomprehensible courage of a few thousand men who held up the German 6th army long enough to spring the decisive trap."

Whence this "desperate" courage of the military? Or the heroic endurance of the starving population in Leningrad, besieged but never conquered? In Mein Kampf, Hitler preaches that the most brutal war is the most merciful, for it is won fastest; and in Soviet Russia he practised to the full the evil "mercy" he had preached. With word getting around of the fate meeting captives of the Germans, the Russian population — civilians and soldiers — fought with a courage they never knew they had.

Communism brutal tyranny

That was one reason we won. The other was luck. Here again is Overy: "The invasion of France hung on the ability to keep the enemy guessing, against every conceivable odds...and then on the weather. It is hardly surprising that Churchill thought at the end of the war that Providence had brought the Allies through."

Churchill himself had a crucial share. Long a foe of communism, and even now not disguising his hostility, in what historian A.J.P. Taylor has called the "greatest act of statesmanship in modern times," he did not even let a day pass without veritably jumping to the aid of the attacked: "I have to make a declaration, but can you doubt what our policy will be? We have but one aim...to destroy Hitler and every vestige of the Nazi regime...until, with the help of God, we have rid the earth of his shadow."

That and more he said in a historic address to his people, still gravely endangered themselves.

Communism was a brutal tyranny. But a Nazi victory would be the end of civilization. Trying to put it in a single sentence, I once put the horror humanity has escaped thus: humanity divided into racial subhumans and supermen, both having ceased to be human, both enslaved, the first by others, the second to enslaving others, all born and bred to no other purpose, in turn breeding others to the same purpose, and these yet others, and so on, for the thousand years that the Third Reich was to last.

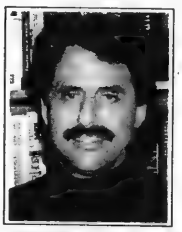
Churchill was of indispensable help in getting rid of Hitler. However, he did not succeed in getting rid of his shadow. The "mercy" Hitler practised on the Russians, this and more he practised also on Jews who had no means of fighting back. Indeed, he lost the war but, alas, won the Holocaust.

These 50 years, we thought, at least, it was over, but now we know it is not. There are Holocaust perpetrators, victims and bystanders. But with works such as Christopher Browning's Ordinary Men and Daniel Goldhagen's Hitler's Willing Executioners, we only now get a fuller knowledge of what the perpetrators did to the victims, while at the same time learning that the bystanders did not just stand by, but shamelessly enriched themselves at the expense of the murdered Jews. Perhaps this simultaneous information is not accident. Perhaps it took 50 years for us to do what Churchill wanted to do, get rid of Hitler's shadow.

For Jews, at any rate, the duty is clear: we must hound that shadow wherever it is.

Israel's divided capital an unbearable fact

How many times have we heard Israeli leaders emphasize that Jerusalem is the indivisible and eternal Capital of the Jewish State. Within the Jewish heart, it is most certainly the geographical, spiritual core of this nation.



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

And how many times have we heard Palestinians, and more than a billion Muslims, claim there will be no real peace until Arab Jerusalem will be the capital of a sovereign Palestinian State. Within the Islamic consciousness this too is a fundamental axiom.

So with Palestinian and Israeli negotiators preparing to tackle the toughest of issues — the future status of Jerusalem — a solution doesn't seem possible.

Unfortunately, both sides still find it too difficult to cope with the reality of Jerusalem.

That reality points out that Jerusalem is a totally divided city, divided into a Jewish and Islamic world, divided into Hebrew speaking and Arabic speaking regions, divided in loyalties, and divided in cultures.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu demands the Palestinians close their government offices in Jerusalem, but even if those doors close, east Jerusalem will remain Palestinian and west Jerusalem will remain Israeli. The Western Wall will remain Jewish, the Temple Mount will remain Islamic. The populations will not mix, and they will not accept the other community's domination.

Populations refuse to mix

Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad activists may dream of a new Salah A Din who will lead Arab armies into Jerusalem defeating the Jews as he defeated the Crusaders, but like the Jewish dream, this too is wasted fantasy, not fact. No Arab army is going to conquer Jerusalem from a nuclear armed Jewish State.

The fact is, Jerusalem is already a divided capital — an unbearable fact, yes, but still a fact. Arabs and Jews have been trying to push each other out of Jerusalem for nearly a 100 years. But like the rest of this contested land, Jerusalem has condemned both nations to share this city, like it or not.

Israeli suburbs expand and so do Palestinian neighborhoods. Israelis turn to their municipality and mayor; Palestinians turn to their local leaders and governor in the Abou Dis suburb. Diplomats visit the Israeli Foreign Ministry in west Jerusalem and the Palestinian Orient House in east Jerusalem.

Personally, I don't find a Palestinian capital in Arab suburbs of Jerusalem a threat to my Jewish identity or a danger to my spiritual attachment to this city. Shabbat will still be Shabbat at the Western Wall. Jewish life will remain vibrant in the Jewish quarter of the Old City. The Knesset, the Israel Museum, the Hebrew University, all manifestations of Jewish political-cultural activity, will continue to thrive in Jerusalem.

Palestinian sovereignty in Arab Jerusalem cannot threaten Israeli sovereignty in Jewish Jerusalem, just like the Israeli government can't really unify this city into one homogenous Capital.

A year ago, it would have been unthinkable that a Likud government would hand over Hebron. Five, 10 or 15 years from now we will see a future government compromise over Jerusalem.

In time, we will face this reality and move on. A Star of David over the Western Wall, an Islamic flag over the Haram El Sharif may enable the human beings in the city and the region to live in peace.

Museum of Tolerance

"You must see the Museum of Tolerance," my nephew told us when we visited Los Angeles recently.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

He was right; I found it to be a must, even after having been exposed to the Holocaust Museum in Washington on two different occasions.

To be sure, the basic ingredients are the same; the growth of Nazism, the terror of persecution, the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, the partisans, the horror and the valor. But there are palpable differences as well.

Most significantly, the Los Angeles museum, created and run by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, has a somewhat broader focus. It not only deals with Jews, it also pursues the theme of tolerance in general. Thus, on entering the exhibit area, one is greeted by a challenge to determine one's own degree of intolerance in a variety of ways. A whole room is dedicated to the Rwanda slaughter, and the pictures of 6,000 children who are still looking for their parents fill its walls, creating a memorable tapestry of suffering. There is room for only the 6,000 images, but many more children are currently orphaned and hope that they might miraculously find surviving members of their families. The walls depict graphically the immense task that Rwandans face in the painfully difficult reconstruction of their lives.

Still, the Shoah remains the chief focus of the exhibits. In some ways, I found them more graphic than their Washington counterparts. That is not surprising for a museum in the city that harbors Hollywood, and indeed, virtual stage settings dot the exhibits. In one memorable scene, the visitor becomes part of an outdoor restaurant of 1933 Germany, just after the Nazis had come to power. Three-dimensional, life-like figures sit at tables, and the lights switch from one pair of guests to another, letting us listen to their conversations. Almost all the "actors" express their belief that the Nazis will turn out to be tamer than expected, and that sooner or later the German people will throw them out. But some disagree and announce their intent to leave the country forthwith. I looked and listened hard; I could almost see my father sitting at one of the tables and saying what they were saying. He too could not imagine the horror that eventually befell all of us.

State-of-the art interactive exhibits are everywhere. I went to a screen where I could retrace my own steps in the conquest of the Dora-Mittelbau-Nordhausen concentration camp. I looked at the pictures they showed and could have asked the machine to print them out for me, but decided against it.

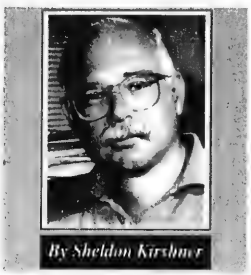
About 1,000 people a day visit the museum, I was told. We encountered school children of various ages, and I have no doubt that what they saw and heard in the 2½ hours it takes to make the tour will stay with them for a long time.

I also hope they took a "little identity card" of some child caught in the cauldron. At various stages of the journey they would find out what happened to that child and his/her family during the Holocaust years.

"It could have been you," the subliminal message says.

The Kirshner File

Author takes a timely, moving look at Eastern Europe



By Sheldon Kirshner

Upwards of five million Jews resided in Poland, Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic prior to the Holocaust. Now these countries contain fewer than 120,000 Jews, as well as the relics of vanished or greatly diminished Jewish communities.

Ruth Ellen Gruber, a United Press International correspondent, visited these post-Communist societies in 1989 from her base in Vienna. She has produced an informative account of her travels, Upon The Doorposts Of Thy House: Jewish Life In East-Central Europe, Yesterday And Today (John Wiley & Sons, $34.95). The book is both timely and moving.

Gruber, an American, wanted to fulfil two broad goals — to document remnants of Jewish life and to explore disused synagogues, graveyards and buildings which evoke a vibrant lost world.

She falls short of painting a complete picture of present-day realities in these much-depleted Jewish communities. However, she succeeds in conveying their haunting past. Quite aptly, Gruber employs the mezuzah as a metaphor of a bygone epoch.

"Today, on the doorposts of countless houses in countless towns and villages throughout East-Central Europe, where few if any Jews have lived since the Holocaust half a century ago, it is still possible to distinguish the places where mezuzahs had once been attached, marking these houses as Jewish homes," she writes. "On some doorposts there are actual scars — empty, often very neat, gouges in the wood left when the mezuzahs were removed."

Gruber then launches into her narrative, which is filled with 50 of her own black and white photographs.

In Prague, a tourist draw with about 1,000 registered Jews, Gruber wanders through old Jewish neighborhoods, weathered cemeteries and venerable synagogues. As she discovers, the hollow-eyed visage of Franz Kafka — Prague's most illustrious son — peers out from postcards, posters, banners, souvenir mugs and T-shirts. During the Communist era, though, Kafka's novels were frowned upon.

Gruber's profile of Prague's new rabbi, Karol Sidon, formerly an assimilated intellectual and political dissident, is instructive. With deft brush strokes, she draws a fine pen portrait of a man whose mother was a Christian, whose Jewish father perished in a concentration camp, whose life was saved by Christian relatives during the Nazi occupation, and whose awakening to Judaism was visceral.

In the following chapter, Gruber visits the Tokaj wine region of northeastern Hungary, where Chassidism flourished. In the town of Tokaj, she stumbles upon Lajos Lowy, one of the last four adult Jewish men there. Portrayed as a lonely individual, Lowy is obsessed by a desire to preserve the memory of local Jewish history. One of his projects is to photograph and number tombstones in a nearby cemetery before neglect and erosion obiliterate the inscriptions.

He directs the author to the "jewel box" of Tokaj, the great but delapidated synagogue that was put to use as a warehouse in the wake of the Holocaust. Pressing on, Gruber stops in the village of Mad, where she comes upon "a scallop-sided baroque" synagogue which enchants her.

In the eastern extremity of Slovakia, adjacent to Ukraine, Gruber ventures into Michalovce, a town recommended to her by Josef Klansky, an elderly Prague writer. In her mind's eye, she conjures up visions of a Jewish community which once comprised one-third of the population.

Szeded synagogue a masterpiece

Further down the road, she encounters Meyer Spira, who, together with his sister and his brother-in-law, are the sole remaining Jews of Bardejov. Until the Nazi deportations, Bardejov was 50 per cent Jewish. Today almost nothing of Jewish interest is left, except a synagogue, a bathhouse and a school, all of which are crumbling.

In Budapest, with the largest Jewish population in East-Central Europe, Gruber makes it her business to track down the gravestone of Lipot Baumhorn (1860-1932), a prolific synagogue architect who designed some two dozen shuls.

Baumhorn's masterpiece was the synagogue in Szeged. Clearly impressed by this soaring edifice, she describes it as "an eclectic extravaganza of Baroque, Moorish, Romanesque and even Art Nouveau styles bristling with cupolas, turrets, tracery, mosaics, gilding, stained glass and frescoes," topped by a massive dome surmounted by a Star of David.

After an exhaustive three-year search, Gruber finally finds Baumhorn's grave with the help of two attendants. Thick ivy, resembling a shimmering outer shroud, encrusts the tombstone. As her excitement wells up, she claws at the stems and creepers, restoring to daylight "the chiseled memory of this man." Understandably, she feels like a liberator.

In Poland, home to 3.3 million Jews in 1939, Gruber explores Kazimierz, Krakow's venerable Jewish quarter. Untouched by the Nazis, Kazimierz, with its synagogues, shtieblach and institutional buildings, is a "symbol of Jewish absence." The words are those of Henryk Halkowski, one of the handful of Jews still living in Krakow.

Gruber wonders whether Kazimierz should be left in its decrepit state or restored as a monument to Polish Jewry. It's an academic question, since funds are lacking and the ownership of property has yet to be clarified.

The last Jew in Auschwitz

On the last leg of her odyssey, she makes a pilgrimage to Auschwitz, known in Polish as Oswiecim. For Jews, Auschwitz is the "ultimate symbol" of the Holocaust. For Poles, it is the epitome of "Polish suffering under the Nazis."

There, Gruber meets Franciszek Piper, director of the research department at the Auschwitz museum. His knowledge of Oswiecim's destroyed Jewish community is awesome.

Thanks to a tip from a local reporter, she resolves to interview Szymon Klueger, the last remaining Jewish inhabitant of Oswiecim. But as Gruber stands by the gate to his house, she changes her mind.

"I debated with myself about walking up that path and knocking on the door and confronting ... the man who so easily fit into a set of quotation marks: 'The Last Jew in Auschwitz.' I chose to walk away."

Snowbound in Auschwitz, Gruber meditates on her journey through Eastern Europe. Her observations are those of a sensitive, caring observer, and fortunately, they permeate Upon The Doorposts Of Thy House.

Student teams spar in unique Bible contest

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

THORNHILL — On a recent Sunday morning, 12 teams of students from six supplementary schools in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) sparred in the local Bible contest.

The event, sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), was held at Netivot HaTorah Day School in Thornhill.

There was a 25 percent increase in the number of contestants this year, with 41 students participating, compared to 31 a year ago, said contest organizer Joyce Levine, coordinator of student services at the BJE. The students were in grades 5 to 7.

The participating schools — most fielded two teams — were Beth Tikvah Synagogue School, Holy Blossom Temple Religious School, Orah School for Jewish Children from the Soviet Union, Temple Kol Ami Religious School, Bet Sefer Solel and the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS).

Toronto is the only community in Canada which offers a local contest, Levine said, noting that there are no big prizes to be won.

"It's really just for fun. The students have a good time at it...It's great to see the kids excited about learning Torah. These students are most often learning on their own time," she added.

This year's contest was on the text of Exodus. The students study the text rather than the commentary, she explained. "They study it so well they retain it for years."

For a second consecutive year, teams from Beth Tikvah and the DJCS came first and second respectively. Chava and Leah Schwebel, Adam Silver and Kimberly Edwards were members of the winning team from Beth Tikvah. Ben Strauss, Esther Lexchin and Katie Costin of the DJCS placed second.

Moishe Kesten, an executive board member of the BJE, awarded books to the two winning team members at the closing ceremony.

Kesten said he was very impressed with the students' enthusiasm. "I found it inspirational that students from supplementary schools were all hyped up and excited about studying the Bible."

Dr. Uri Korin, principal of Bialik Hebrew Day School and a judge at the local Bible contest for the last 10 years, said he was impressed with the level of knowledge.

"It was obvious that the teachers and the students put in a tremendous amount of effort," Korin said.

The average score of the six schools he judged was 92 percent, he said, pointing out that this level of achievement is much more difficult to attain in supplementary schools than in the day schools. Bible study is an extracurricular activity for supplementary school students, he said. "They are making a major commitment to learn Tanach."

The other contest judges were Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University; Yael Seliger, director of teacher development at the BJE; and Laura Wiseman, program director of Judaic studies at United Synagogue Day School. Gary Levine, director of student services at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, moderated the trivia round, in which all the teams participated at once.

The local Bible contest was held on the same day as the preliminary written exams for the Regional/national Bible contest.

New parenting magazine focuses on special needs kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'Yadeinu, the new kid on the block in parenting magazines, has a different slant.

This quarterly publication is devoted to children with special needs in the Jewish community.

The term special needs refers to such a wide variety of difficulties as developmental delays, physical challenges, genetic anomalies, emotional difficulties, even such conditions as anorexia.

Editor Susie Mittelman-Sokol, herself the mother of a special needs child, 12-year-old Talya, sees it as "a way of sharing, learning, venting, chizuk (strength), interaction, dialogue," for families who have children with special needs.

But she intends to gear the publication to the broader community as well.

"I want rabbis to be more involved, for instance. Families need support from the community. The community is led by the rabbis — the values they teach trickle down to the community."

She wants to show professionals in the medical and education fields "the reality behind the theories. I want them to see the issues families face between therapy sessions, so they can have a better understanding of the family unit."

For others not directly involved, "I want to explain the child they will see at shul and at the park, and start a dialogue about what they will experience."

Children who have special needs are "still part of the kehillah, the Jewish community, even if they don't attain what we would want for them," she says.

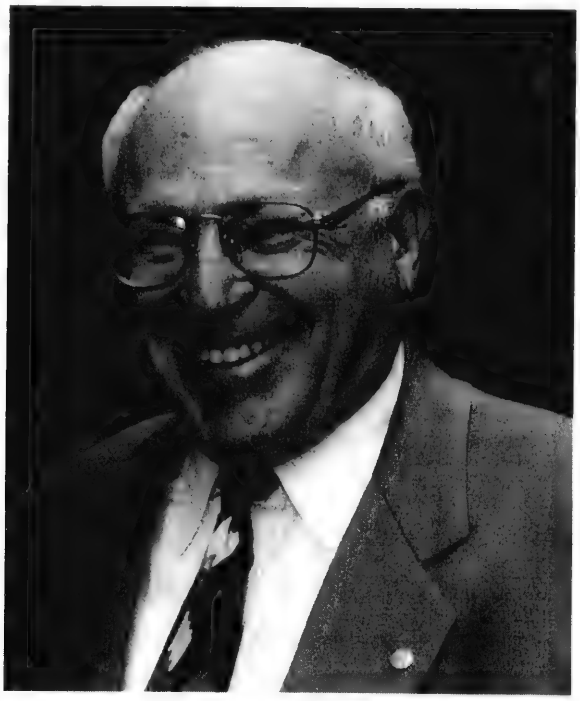
The first issue, dated December 1996, is a glossy, 23-page effort with a decidedly professional look. There are articles about immunization, stress, sensitizing children to those who are "different," and ChaYil, a new organization for parents of special needs children.

Features in every issue will include news from across Canada, crafts, poems, Sib Side (a sibling's experiences with the family member who has special needs) and Parental Vent for parents' comments.

Mittelman-Sokol also runs a So Proud...So Embarrassed feature, which will give examples of community happenings one can be proud of, or ashamed of. (The first So Embarrassed tells of the person who asked that copies of B'Yadeinu be sent in brown, unmarked envelopes.)

Reaction to the first issue has been very positive, Mittelman-Sokol said. "I have gotten many calls asking to subscribe, and a lot of people have asked to help with the magazine."

Yearly subscription is $18. For more information, write B'Yadeinu, 800 Steeles Ave. W., Suite B10-183, Thornhill, L4J 7L2.



Edwin Goldstein has been appointed as the Chair of the "Over the Top" Committee of the Baycrest...Imagine Our Future Without It Campaign.

This Committee will lead the final thrust into the community for awareness and fund raising. To date, the Campaign has raised $50 million of the $60 million goal. The final $10 million is needed to complete the building, and initiate new community service programs.

As an active member of the Jewish community through most of his adult life, and past Chair of the Baycrest Centre Board, Edwin Goldstein has been involved with Baycrest for over 30 years.

"Everyone at Baycrest, and everything at Baycrest is first class," Edwin said. "I am proud of the work done here and the care that is given. We have to look after our elders, and ensure they receive the best care and treatment. People are now living longer, which means greater numbers of elderly are needing assistance. Baycrest's work is becoming more and more important."

"I took on the role of Chair because I know there is a pride of ownership for Baycrest within the Jewish community. And I also know I have the support and confidence of Harold Lederman, Chair, Baycrest Centre Foundation, Florence Minz Geneen, Chair, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and the nine Chairs of the Campaign.

"The final push for the goal must come from all of us. The Campaign team, the community, and you! We have to raise the last $10 million. We have to put the community care plans in place, and the roof on the building. Please help. It's your Baycrest!"

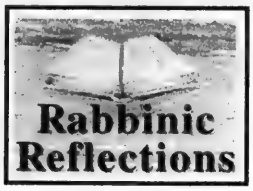
PRESENTED IN CO-OPERATION WITH THE CONSULATE GENERAL OF ISRAEL, TORONTO



No one is indispensable

By RABBI CHANAYA M. BERZON

Many commentaries pose the question why the Torah portion Tezaveh does not begin with: "And G-d spoke unto Moses..." Instead, Moses's name is deleted. The parshah begins with: "And thou (meaning Moses) command the children of Israel etc." HaShem is directing his words towards Moses, but not calling him by name. Why?

The Baal Haturim remarks that since Moses said "Erase me from the Book which You have written." HaShem erased Moses from his parshah. After the episode of the Golden Calf, HaShem told Moses He was ready to destroy the Jewish nation and build a new nation from Moses and his descendants. Moses responds with his limitless love of his people, saying, "If you destroy them, I too want out. I don't want any part of your plan."

The Almighty castigating Moses in this fashion does not seem to make any sense. Moses should be commended for his act of love for his people. He cares for them, and is willing to forfeit his own personal future for them. So why the punishment?

Obviously, Moses, in threatening HaShem, implies that HaShem can not go it alone without Moses. It was as if he was stating "You have no choice. If I don't go along with You there is nothing. Without my cooperation and agreement to father your planned new nation, there is no Torah, no Israel and even no world. So, G-d, You are forced to listen to me. You can't make it without me."

HaShem, by deleting Moses' name from one parshah, is conveying a clear message to Moses and mankind. No person is indispensable. "Moses ... Got along without you before I met you. Gonna get along without ya now." True, Moses you are the most important man ever created. There never was and never will be a prophet, a teacher, a leader like you. No one has ever shown as much self-effacement and love. But that will not be the reason for destroying the world. The world will survive without you. Perhaps with great difficulty. But it will!

How true to life this message is. Let me cite a few illustrations.

Marital strife: Isn't it true that at least one of the partners is convinced that the other would be devastated if they would separate. "I'll teach my partner that without me there is nothing. My spouse will just fall apart." Perhaps there is a degree of truth in this remark. Life can be rough going it alone. But life goes on. Eventually the partner, often with difficulty, puts life together and continues. The partner learns to "get along without ya!"

Isn't it the same with children who threaten to abandon us if we refuse to condone their self-destructive behavior?

We encounter such conduct in communal life. Occasionally, we have a leader who is advancing the cause with colossal competency. He gets off track and when it is pointed out, threatens to resign. We offer to conciliate and placate. He refuses. We fear the enterprise will collapse. How can we persevere without this person at our helm? Something happens. We do prevail. It is difficult initially. We were accustomed to his direction, input, capabilities. Someone else takes the helm. We flounder for a while but eventually we get back on track.

HaShem, at the onset of our parshah, sends a message to all of us. No person is indispensable. Even the great Moses in his own Torah — in this parshah — can remain nameless.

Rabbi Berzon is spiritual leader of Young Israel of Chomedey, Quebec.

Diplomatically Speaking

By Jehudi Kinar

The hectic life of a consul general

Very often I am asked about the consul general's duties. People understandably get confused about work done by a consulate and work done by the embassy.

The ambassador has the overall function of representing the State of Israel across Canada, and deals primarily with federal issues. Consulates, on the other hand, of which we have two in Canada — Montreal and Toronto — deal more specifically with provincial and communal matters. Israel currently has a total of 108 missions abroad, 21 of which are consulates.

In general, consulates are established in large countries which boast major cities, and in the case of United States and Canada with larger concentration of Jewish communities. There are nine consulates in the United States and two in Canada, which together account for more than 50 percent of our consulates worldwide. Were it not for the financial burden, we would certainly open a consulate in Vancouver, a city making enormous strides in the economic and political arenas as well as in the Jewish world.

As it stands now, the consulate in Montreal is responsible for Quebec and the Maritime provinces, and Toronto for Ontario and Western Canada. Although our consular department is very busy issuing official travel documents and the legalization of other documents, this constitutes only a small part of our daily work.

We try to improve links with political leaders, to enhance economic cooperation such as suggesting investments in Israel or proposing partnership between Canadian and Israeli firms. We also do our utmost to act as a cultural bridge between Israel and Canada, trying to expose the Canadian community to Israeli culture, and vice versa. We follow the local, provincial and national press and try to keep the media informed of events in Israel. The Israeli Government Tourist Office for its part, tries to attract an increasing number of Canadian tourists to Israel each year.

At the same time, the consulate serves as a direct link between Israel and the Jewish communities in the different provinces under our jurisdiction. The many activities of the large number of Jewish organizations in Toronto are very demanding on our representatives. The manifold events which take place on the same day and often the same hour cause us many conflicts; needless to say we would like to be present at as many events as possible.

Furthermore, the communities in such cities as Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Hamilton, London and Windsor also have their demands, and rightly so. Not that we are complaining, but one or two additional staff members would ease our lives. For the time being, however, in light of current budgetary constraints in Israel, this is not likely to happen in the foreseeable future. As is normal in such work, we usually know at what time we will start our day, but never when it will end.

On a somewhat different note, in my capacity as consul general, I am confronted on a daily basis with the bizarre and unexpected. We answer our telephones in the office with great trepidation. Not uncommonly, we hear from people claiming to be the messiah; others have solutions to the problems plaguing the Middle East — if not the world. We have listened to suggestions about building a subway line from Eilat to the Hermon, individuals inquiring about visas to Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Iraq; there are still others who call with urgent messages for the Mossad, and their confreres who await instructions.

Peretz remembered

I. L. Peretz Reader edited by Ruth Wisse (Random House, $21 (paper).

Isaac Leib Peretz (1852-1915) was one of the three great "classic" Yiddish writers — the others being Mendele Mocher Sforim and Shalom Aleichem.

Peretz was a man of many contradictions. Born in Poland to a rejected and persecuted minority, he reached out for universal cultural ideals. Jailed at one point for his socialist views, he remained suspicious of any form of collectivism that would suppress or deny individual creativity. Suspicious of Zionism, he worked to create a Jewish "Diaspora nationalism" based on the Yiddish language. Convinced of the need for Jewish acculturation to the outside world he nevertheless strove to preserve what he considered precious and distinctive in his own tradition.

For 25 years, Peretz served as an official of the Jewish community of Warsaw, giving untiringly of himself as prolific writer, publisher, teacher and dramatist.

The I. L. Peretz Reader contains 26 short stories, many of them newly translated. They can be read today with the same fresh delight and meaning as a century ago when they were written.

In the brief tale, Der Golem, which relates a legend about the famous figure of clay created by Rabbi Low of Prague, Peretz injects a bitter satire on what he considers petrified Judaism. He concludes, "The Golem is still here; he is not forgotten, but the Shem — the ineffable Name of God — by means of which the Golem was animated, is irreparably lost. The clay body of the Golem lies, and the cobwebs over it grow thicker and thicker, but no one is allowed to disturb it, for both the Golem and the cobwebs are sacred."

Hypocrisy is satirized in the tale Die Frume Katz (The Pious Cat). A pious cat kills two canaries, one after the other, because they spend their days foolishly without worrying about the hereafter. He kills them as a sacred duty, but the deed is discovered and the cat is punished. He finally concludes that he will turn a third sinful canary from the path of error by kindness, by embracing it and preaching to it. "But," ends the tale, "since a canary cannot live in air exhaled by cats, it died of suffocation."

Some of the most successful stories deal with the world of Chassidism. In his famous story, Oib Nisht Noch Hecher (If Not Higher), we are told how a Lithuanian skeptic doubled the stories of extreme piety told about the Zaddik of Nemirov. He decides to investigate and discovers how the Zaddik performs a good deed — chopping wood and lighting fire for a widow in a forest cabin. Ever afterward whenever he heard people say of the Zaddik that he ascends to heaven during the holiday season, he would say, "if not higher."

In the story Zwishen Zwei Berg (Between Two Mountains), the two characters are a master of Talmudic learning and a former youthful disciple who left him because of his dry and sterile teaching. They represent two sides of Judaism, the intellectual and the emotional. On the day of Simchat Torah, the two, the rabbi and his disciple meet.

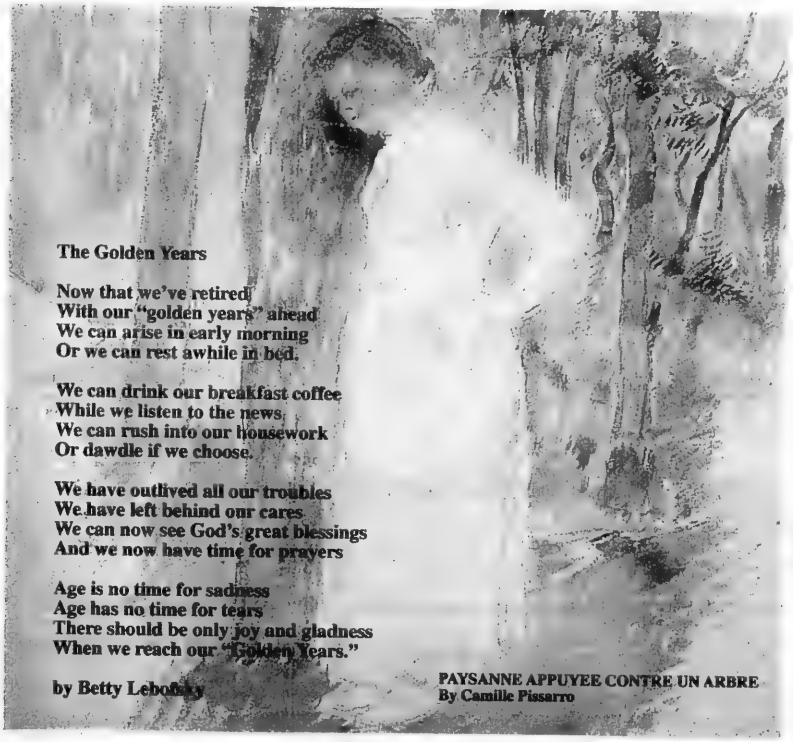
"Why, Noah, did you leave me?" asks the rabbi.

"Because," Noah answers, "your Torah, master, is justice without mercy; it is intended for the scholar, for the select. What message have you, master, for the entire House of Israel, for the woodchopper, butcher, tailor, and all unlearned Jews?"

The former student then led the rabbi to the balcony and showed him a group of Chassidim on the lawn whose faces were bright and among whom joy reigned as they sang a chassidic melody. It was a veritable joy of the Torah. The rabbi of Brisk was impressed but not converted. Silently, master and disciple parted.

For those who have never read the stories of Peretz this book will provide much pleasure. To those already familiar with them, it will bring renewed interest and meaning.

When Peretz died, more than 100,000 mourners came to his funeral. They had lost a friend who was a magical weaver with words of their lives, hopes and dreams.



The Golden Years

Now that we've retired
With our "golden years" ahead
We can arise in early morning
Or we can rest awhile in bed.

We can drink our breakfast coffee
While we listen to the news,
We can rush into our housework
Or dawdle if we choose.

We have outlived all our troubles
We have left behind our cares
We can now see God's great blessings
And we now have time for prayers

Age is no time for sadness
Age has no time for tears
There should be only joy and gladness
When we reach our "Golden Years."

Quebec Nationalism: What Does It Mean for the Future of 'Ethnics and Money'?

Sunday, February 23 at 7pm

After former Quebec Premier Jacques Parizeau blamed 'Ethnics and Money' for the Yes side defeat in the October 1995 referendum, the question for the almost 100,000 Quebec Jews still remains an urgent one. Should they start packing their suitcases and abandoning their homes? Should Toronto prepare for a new onslaught of Montrealers?
Our panel of high profile and outspoken Montreal "movers and shakers" share their insights on this vital issue.

Speakers:

Marcel Coté-Economist and co-founder of SECOR Consulting, and an outspoken federalist.

Robert Vineberg-Senior partner national law firm of Goodman Phillips & Vineberg.

Michael Goldbloom-President and Publisher of The Gazette. Montreal's last remaining anglophone newspaper.

Moderator:
Nancy Wilson-Co-host of POLITICS on CBC Newsworld.

Todres new president of Baycrest Foundation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Elaine Todres

TORONTO — After 20 years of public service under three political parties, Elaine Todres, Ontario's deputy solicitor general and deputy minister of correctional services, is leaving government to become president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation, the fundraising arm of Baycrest Centre.

"Baycrest gives me an opportunity to be involved in a broader public sector environment providing leadership to a Jewish institution that is committed to Jewish values, care of the elderly and tikkun olam — repair of the world.

"[It] is a unique institution in its commitment to providing a broad continuum of services."

Todres is married to Rubin Todres, a professor of social work at the University of Toronto and is the mother of Lindsay, 14, and Jesse, 12. She attends Darchei Noam Synagogue, where she co-chairs the ritual committee.

Born and raised in Winnipeg, she is the daughter of Holocaust survivors Bernice (Auerbach) and Arie Meller. Her mother, from Zborow, Poland, near the Russian border, and her father, from Kazimieraz Wielka in Poland, met and married after the war in a DP camp in Germany. They had a relative in Winnipeg and in 1948, they came to Canada to start a new life.

Todres attended the Talmud Torah, Joseph Wolinsky Hebrew High School and the University of Winnipeg. She was a dancer and singer in the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble, taught piano and Hebrew and was a group leader at Young Judaea.

Elaine and Rubin were married in Winnipeg in 1970 and when she completed her doctorate in political science at the University of Pittsburgh, she moved to Toronto to join her huband.

She entered the Ontario public service in 1976 with the Ministry of Revenue and held a number of posts. As deputy minister of Human Resources Secretariat and chair of the Civil Service Commission, she was responsible for developing and implementing government policies on employment equity, sexual harassment and pay equity.

As assistant deputy minister of the Ontario Women's Directorate, she directed the development of Ontario's policy on child care and family violence, and was responsible for the development of Ontario's pay equity legislation.

Currently, she is chief executive officer of the Ministry of Correctional Services and oversees a staff of 15,600. She advises the premier and cabinet on a broad range of issues such as modernizing and integrating the criminal justice system and modernizing the jail system.

She was a founding member of the United Jewish Appeal Business and Professional Women's Network and a member of the executive committee and chair of the Human Resources Committee at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

She has won a number of awards including Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Young Leadership Award, the National Woman of Achievement Award presented by Hadassah WIZO Organization of Canada, a gold medal from the Centre for Human Rights and Race Relations, and she is a nominee for Who's Who in America.

In announcing her appointment, Stephen Herbert, president and chief executive officer of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, said, "We are fortunate to have attracted someone with such an enormous breadth of experience in public service."

Todres takes her position on April 1. She succeeds Stan Feldman who intends to pursue graduate studies.

'Lucky' Sammy shares with less fortunate

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sammy Cohen considers himself a very lucky little boy, and he's sharing that luck with children who are not as fortunate.

At the beginning of January, Sammy, a 7½-year-old student at Netivot HaTorah Hebrew Day School, and his father were walking home from Friday night dinner with some friends, when the boy was hit by a car and dragged some 40 feet.

Aside from scrapes and bruises and a concussion, his most serious injury was a broken femur, and he found himself in traction for three weeks at York Central Hospital. He is now at home in a body cast and manages to get around on crutches.

Since the accident, say his mother, Judi, a social worker in the psychiatric day hospital at Baycrest, and his father, Jeremy, assistant director of the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada, people have been "incredible," bringing food, coming to visit, and offering to help.

Best of all, from Sammy's point of view, is the many toys and games people have brought him. (The other "best thing" is that he got to miss school. He is now going for an hour and a half a day.)

He decided to donate some of his presents to the Junior UJA Tzedakah All-Star Team.

Sammy Cohen drops some of the presents he received after his traffic accident into the Junior UJA Tzedakah All Star Team gift box at his school, Netivot HaTorah. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

The project, which was begun in December 1995 by volunteer Elizabeth Erlich, was designed "as a way to teach the kids the concept of tzedakah in a creative way," said Howard English, director of communications for UJA Federation.

It is also seen, he said, as "a way of building Jewish leaders at a very early age."

Boxes are set up in participating schools (13 at the present time, including Leo Baeck, Eitz Chaim, USDS, Associated and Netivot). The idea is for children to donate one of their birthday or Chanukah presents, or presents given them for any other reason. The gifts are given to Jewish Family & Child Service, which distributes them to clients.

Contribution appreciated

Each child who donates a present is sent a thank you card for every donation, "so they realize that their contribution is appreciated," said administrative assistant Sylvia Astrug.

As well, they automatically become members of the 2,000-strong Junior UJA Club and get discounts for Chanukah and Purim parties at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Other benefits are being worked on, English said.

"Junior UJA and the Tzedakah All Star Team are the only projects of their kind in North America," he said. "We are being called from all over for information about what we are doing."

Over 800 contributions were received in 1996, and the project, chaired by Karen Amato, continues to do well.

Leo Baeck students rent a tree from kibbutz's orchards

TORONTO — Students at Leo Baeck Day School are participating in a unique project to rent a tree in Israel.

Through the Partners for Peace project of Kibbutz Yahel, students raise money to rent a pomelo tree for one year from the kibbutz's orchards on the Jordanian border.

Leo Baeck students will be raising $180 (US) rental for each tree. In exchange, they will receive 30 pounds of Yahel pomelos, a fruit that is a cross between an orange and a grapefruit. The fruit is scheduled to arrive in time for Tu b'Shvat.

The money raised will go towards Yahel programs aimed at bringing Israeli and Arab children from the area together to promote peaceful interaction between the two groups.

Kibbutz Yahel, the first Reform kibbutz in Israel, is located in the southern Arava, just north of Eilat. Harvesting the pomelo is a primary source of income for the kibbutz.

Recent peace negotiations called to question the continued existence of these fields as part of Israel, but a compromise was reached and the new, somewhat uneven border allows the kibbutz to keep its cultivated land.

Jewish youth said just as likely to run afoul of law

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish youth get in trouble with the law for the same reasons as those in the general community, says a probation supervisor for young offenders in North York.

"Jewish teens are no different than other teens. By and large, they act out because of their environment," Marc Levine said at a recent breakfast meeting of the Shaarei Shomayim Brotherhood.

He said Jews represent about one percent of the population of Metropolitan Toronto and "it is fair to say that out of about 1,300 youth on probation in Metro, about one percent are Jewish.

Teens may get in trouble because they are doing poorly in school or have low self-esteem; they may be looking for attention, he said. "Basically, they are crying out. They are sending out a message that there is a problem."

Levine said the Young Offenders Act, which affects youth 12 to 17 years old, replaced the old Juvenile Delinquent Act, "which did not protect the rights of youth. Under that act, kids could have technically been placed in a training school for years. The Young Offenders Act holds them responsible in fair ways. People think that youth get away with things, but they really do not. I think more kids than ever are being held accountable."

The probation period, he said, gives a young offender the opportunity to remain in the community and prove that he can behave in a responsible manner. The length of the probation order and the conditions that must be followed are set by a youth court judge under the terms of the Young Offender Act according to the needs of each youth.

When there is a reporting condition, the young person sees a probation officer on a regular basis. "These officers recognize the importance of working closely with the youth's family. The officers are also involved in community service orders which have youth work at various community agencies."

Asked if more youth are committing crimes today than several years ago, Levine said the crime rate has not risen, but the level of sophistication has.

"More kids today are walking around with knives and guns and appear to lack appropriate supervision."

In one case study of a Jewish boy who is on 12 months probation, Levine said the boy told him that he gets along with his parents because they do not punish him.

"Parents are not accountable for their kids' crimes, but they are responsible for their children. They should not ignore any signs of trouble. Early intervention is essential, although there is no quick-fix solution. It takes time to resolve issues," he said.

February 22nd–March 3rd
Queen's Park claims that a megacity will save money.
We believe it will mean higher taxes and reduced services for the people of North York.
The province also plans to download almost $400 million in extra costs for welfare and other social services onto our property taxes. This will make their megacity plan even more expensive for all of us.
Queen's Park is rushing through its megacity legislation. Why should we let ourselves be pushed into such drastic change without knowing how it will affect us?
In a democracy we have a right to be heard. And the North York referendum makes it easy for us to have our say.

Habonim Dror shlichah settles in her new job

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shula Ofir

TORONTO — When Shula Ofir finally arrived here from Israel in mid-October, there were so many phone messages awaiting her that new callers were told her voice mailbox was full.

Now settled in as Habonim Dror shlichah, she succeeds Orit Praag, who returned to Israel early last summer after 2½ years as emissary for the Labor Zionist youth movement. (The long gap resulted from bureaucratic delays in arranging Ofir's Canadian visa.)

A native of Iraq, Ofir moved to Israel at age 5 with her family. A teacher, former high school principal and mother of three grown children, she also served as Habonim Dror shlichah in Johannesburg, South Africa from 1986 to 1988.

Later she spent three short stints in Russia, teaching intensive Hebrew ulpan and organizing Jewish holiday programs for teenagers about to make aliyah.

Most recently, Ofir, 51, served as manager of Kibbutz Givat Brenner, her home for almost 30 years, located near Rehovot. She is a former army officer and has worked for Israel's United Kibbutz movement, with which Habonim Dror is affiliated. (On March 2 Habonim Dror will host an open house meeting with Amichai Yarchi of the America-Israel High School Program at Kibbutz Beit Hashita.)

Na'amat, which is also affiliated with Habonim Dror, represents another longtime connection for Ofir. Her affiliation with the organization in Israel led to her involvement in a number of women's issues. Here, she will serve as a resource person for the group.

Her priority right now, though, is to increase the number of youngsters participating in Habonim Dror.

"I think the youth movement is the best way of making friends and having a good time, and it's educational."

The Toronto chapter has several programs a month. This year's calendar includes a Tu b'Shvat telethon for trees, ice skating, participation in Na'amat's annual bazaar (selling falafel) and a fall seminar, attended by 120 youngsters.

The Hamilton chapter, for which Ofir is also responsible, has similar programming.

In this province, Habonim Dror also has a presence in Kitchener, London and Ottawa. The latter city has its own shlichah. Vancouver is the only other Canadian city to have a Habonim Dror shaliach.

Most of the participants have become involved through Camp Gesher, the movement's summer camp in Cloyne, Ontario, or through friends. The movement also runs a summer leadership training program for teens in Israel.

While Ofir expects that young people will not come out to local programs if they "just" want to have fun, she notes that often those who come for fun end up being "the best people in the movement."

Ofir's goals include increasing parental participation in Habonim Dror and increasing members' participation in the greater Jewish community.

Jewish life alive and well at Ryerson

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Quick, which five Canadian universities have the largest Jewish student populations in the country?

Answer: York University, McGill University, the University of Toronto, the University of Western Ontario and Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Ryerson? Unlikely as it may seem, Ryerson apparently has the fifth largest Jewish campus population in Canada, with a mailing list of over 300 out of an estimated 1,200 Jewish students

According to the 1997 Hillel Guide to Jewish Life on Campus, York has 4,000 Jewish students; McGill, 3,500; and U of T and Western, 3,000 each. (Ryerson, which attained university status in 1993, is not listed, and the University of British Columbia is said to have 1,000 Jewish students.)

"No way," said a Jewish Ryerson student on learning of the local population estimate (based on a Hillel formula). "Where are they?"

Part of the low visibility of Ryerson's Jewish students stems from the "compartmentalized" aspect of the campus, theorized Tami Sitcoff, program coordinator for Ryerson and Seneca College Hillels. "There's no central hangout place at Ryerson. You could really get by without meeting anyone from other programs."

A recent Hillel lounge day — a weekly event held Wednesdays in a sparsely furnished rented room at Ryerson's Oakham House — brought together, over bagels, students from a variety of programs: photography, nursing, and business management, to name a few.

David Shuken, a 23-year-old photography student, said that most of his friends at school are not Jewish. He stopped in at the lounge "primarily for social reasons," he said. Actually, his mother thought he should meet more Jewish girls, he admitted, blushing slightly.

Hillel is "nice because you have a common bond right away," he said.

Like many of the regulars, Shuken considers himself "not very religious." A perception that Hillel is geared for religious students, however, still keeps some away.

Robyn Burnstein, in her third year of social work, is one of those students. She was there with fellow social work student Amy Reinsilber, who is Ryerson's UJA on Campus representative.

"Whenever Robyn comes it's always [been] geared around the religious aspect," said Reinsilber.

Tammy Weisz, a first year New Media student who serves on Hillel's planning committee, is one of the few observant students. "That's fine," she said. "I spent last year in Israel studying. I knew that when I came back I'd want to get involved in the Jewish community here. I wanted to help out. I would love to see 100 new faces here. Every new member is so significant to us."

Aliza Derrick, an Early Childhood Education student, confirmed that she has been made to feel welcome.

"You can always find someone to talk to," said Hanna Mengistu, a nursing student who also serves on Hillel's planning committee.

Ivan Sandor, a student in the Hospitality and Tourism program, makes time for Hillel despite holding down a full-time job and attending classes 18 hours a week.

"It's an outlet to get to know people," said Lyndsay Wise, a student in administration and information management.

As well as increased on-campus activity, including Holocaust Education week programming, a recent Tu b'Shvat "Green Day" and participation in a campus "Cultural Caravan," Ryerson Hillel — as one of the student groups served by Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto — has benefited by an increased number of city-wide programs.

The events are part of a trend on the part of JCS to bring programs to the students, particularly those who commute, "rather than expecting them to come to us," said Sitcoff.

Eyal Lewin, Hillel's treasurer, has noted increased attendance and enthusiasm at Hillel since he signed up as a first-year student in 1994.

Hillel's on-campus facilities, however — the weekly lounge rental and a minuscule shared office — are pretty skimpy, given the estimated number of Jewish students.

In fact, space has been tight for all student groups at least since the early 1980s, when then-journalism student Suzanne Wintrob started Hillel's precursor, the Jewish Student Council (JSC), shlepping kosher bagels and her mother's coffee urn downtown once a week.

"I wanted to have that connection and there wasn't one," she said. "I'm really glad they're still going strong."

A Mission to Hungary, Poland & Israel

In the summer of 1897...

Theodor Herzl, founder of the modern Zionist movement, predicted the creation of a Jewish homeland within fifty years. Half a century later, after the annihilation of one third of world Jewry by the Nazis, the state of Israel was reborn.

A century later...

In the spring of 1997, join one hundred Canadian university students as they travel to the birthplace of Theodor Herzl, witness the despair of eastern Europe's death camps, and the joy and promise of the land of Israel.

In Hungary visit Budapest, birthplace of Holocaust martyr Hannah Senesh, and home to the magnificent century and a half old Donahey Street Synagogue, attended by Theodor Herzl as a child. In Poland take part in the March of the Living from Auschwitz to Birkenau together with thousands of students from around the world. In Israel tour the length and breadth of this ancient yet modern country and celebrate Israel's Independence Day on the streets of Jerusalem.

Be a part of this historic and memorable journey into the past and future of the Jewish people.

Rambam to address CJC Ontario region plenary

TORONTO — American private investigator Steve Rambam will be among the keynote speakers at the 29th Plenary Assembly of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), to be held April 5 and 6 at the Lipa Green Building.

This is Rambam's first Toronto appearance since the story of his finding Nazi war criminals in Canada broke in the international media.

Prof. Irving Abella, chair of the CJC national war crimes committee; Ontario region legal counsel Ed Morgan; and Toronto Star reporter David Vienneau will join Rambam in the plenum of Nazi War Criminals, Nazi Gold. The theme of the Plenary is Congress: Connecting the Community.

CJC Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen also announced the appointment of Marlene Sklar as plenary chair and Cary Green as program chair.

The plenary, which takes place between CJC national assemblies, held every three years, provides the opportunity for public discussion on major issues of interest and concern to Ontario's Jewish community.

Marlene Sklar, a member of the CJC Ontario region executive, and vice-chair of its political liaison committee is a member of the board of the Jewish Women's Federation (JWJ) of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, a member-at-large of the Markham Conservative Riding Association, and is active in Adath Israel Congregation.

Cary Green is a CJC Ontario region officer and chair of its political liaison committee. The Toronto businessman has been involved in community activities such as not-for-profit housing, youth organizations and the movements assisting Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry.

Joining Sklar and Green on the regional plenary committee are Ruthie Zaionz, Simon Rucker and Dr. Fred Ball of Thunder Bay.

A meeting of the CJC Ontario Region Council will be held following the conclusion of the plenary on Sunday afternoon.

Steve Rambam and Irving Abella will address the plenary.

For further information call Jennifer Turack, plenary coordinator, at 416-635-2883, ext. 152 or ext. 154; or fax 416-635-1408.

JIAS business English course helps newcomers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Exactly one year ago last month, Alex Varshavsky immigrated to Canada. A native of Dnepropetrovsk, Ukraine, he arrived in Toronto with training and experience as an electrical engineer, first in the former Soviet Union (FSU) and more recently during a three-year stint in Israel.

Varshavsky, 34, is once again employed in his field, for which he gives much credit to a business English course he took through Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS). His job as a maintenance electrician at Formulated Coatings, an electro-coating company in Brampton, is "exactly like" the job he held in Israel and "almost like" the one he had in the FSU.

The course he took is a relatively recent addition to the JIAS roster of English as a Second Language (ESL) courses, which are offered at seven levels of difficulty and held at the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street.

Barbara Pasternak, a Toronto businesswoman and JIAS ESL teacher, initiated the business English course a year ago for higher-level students. "I saw there was a need to create an acculturization for students coming from Eastern Europe into the Canadian workplace," she said.

Unlike the other courses, this one includes an optional three-month co-op program where students gain practical Canadian experience and a Canadian reference.

The co-op program follows a four-month language course, where students learn workplace vocabulary and discuss cultural differences.

Elena Shaevich, a native of Lvov, is now employed as a travel consultant at YYZ Travel Services, where she completed her co-op placement last year. Her husband, Eugene, opened Alef Monuments with a partner after taking the business English classes.

"Barbara taught us about Canadian lifestyle and how to open a business," said Elena. "She was like an example for us."

A recent class led by Pasternak focused on body language, including facial expression and eye contact, and how they affect credibility at job interviews.

"This is useful for everybody. It's a new experience to get a job [through] an interview. I think it's the same in Russia in general, but some things are different," said Siberian native Grigori Soummer, a 38-year-old mechanical engineer who immigrated last summer.

About 75 to 80 percent of the graduates have been placed in permanent jobs where they began as co-op students, said Pasternak. Last September, 90 students registered for the business English classes. Of those, almost 30 entered the co-op program, almost double the number in the summer program.

Many of the initial placements came about from Pasternak's own contacts through the industrial manufacturing business she and her husband have; more recently, Jewish Vocational Services came on board to help place students.

Matching the students' co-op places to their backgrounds can be a challenge. Among the participants thus far have been bookkeepers, doctors, mechanics and even a nuclear physicist.

"It's a total cross-section of professions," said Pasternak. (Employers interested in offering a placement to a well-trained student volunteer should call Pasternak or Roz Greenberg at 635-7044.)

Varshavsky found the course very helpful. "English from the notebook and English in life and English in an interview are not the same thing," he said.

His co-op placement with an electrical contractor was particularly useful in improving his technical English. Because his co-workers spoke no Russian or Hebrew, Varshavsky picked up the lingo quickly.

Taube espouses 'right' view in his new publication

By RON CSILLAG

TORONTO — Michael Taube is part of a growing cadre of "young Turks" squarely and proudly on the right of Canada's political spectrum. Taube, just 26, espouses a no-nonsense mix of less government and unbridled free enterprise, slashing taxes, dismantling the modern welfare state, and instituting a two-tier health care system.

Taube sees no contradiction between his beliefs and his being Jewish. Indeed, he's quick with several reasons why it's time Jews, so long associated with liberalism and social justice, should finally shed their perceived bias against the domestic right and embrace it as society's last hope.

Michael Taube

(Taube ruffled some feathers last summer when the Globe and Mail published an opinion piece of his, in which he argued that Jews are losing out by not supporting the Tories and Reform in Canada, and the Republicans in the U.S.).

But first, Taube has a product to sell: He's recently published the first issue of From The Right, a quarterly he describes as Canada's "only real" national conservative newspaper. As editor/publisher, Taube speaks excitedly about his venture, a much-needed counterweight, he says, to the rampant liberalism that shoots through Canada's media.

The inaugural issue, a serious-looking, 12-page tabloid, eschews graphics and advertising and concentrates instead on articles by sundry conservatives, including Taube and his father Stanley, a lawyer. Endorsements for the maiden edition come from Taube's own mentors: conservative guru David Frum and writer Michael Coren. Sprinkled throughout the publication are Tory maxims from such noted thinkers as William F. Buckley, author Ayn Rand and U.S. talk-radio host Rush Limbaugh.

Taube printed 2,000 copies of the first issue, published out of his parents' Forest Hill home and financed by his family. Some 1,700 copies were circulated through newsstand sales. It's a modest start, he allows, but he's already hooked up with a national distributor, and the spring '97 issue is firming up, with more big-name conservative writers on tap. Taube is also putting out feelers for sponsors and/or grant money.

Although From The Right reads like a Reform Party tract (Taube openly supports Reform,, as do some of the contributors), the editor says his paper is open to conservatives of all stripes.

"It doesn't matter what I represent," Taube told The CJN. "I want all kinds of conservatives, red and blue, to take part. It's an open forum." It is open too, he adds, to liberals with something to say.

A self-described libertarian conservative, Taube identifies most closely with Frum. Taube feels Preston Manning's Reformers are "honest, intelligent and non-racist," and says the party has handled extremists effectively by expelling them right away.

Armed with a master's degree in political science from the London School of Economics, Taube launched From The Right partly because he felt a need to correct certain public misconceptions about conservatism.

For one, many young people are coming on side: "The [conservative] Fraser Institute says that over the past few years, a lot of 18-24 year-olds have become very conservative." He pauses to clarify that. "People are becoming more aware."

By aware, he argues that more and more people believe Canada's social safety net needs radical fixing; that the federal Tories and Reform need to merge to keep the conservative flame kindled; and that Jewish voters have nothing to fear from the right.

While it's true that historically, Jews have generally shied away from right-wing parties because of their associations with fascism and assorted hatreds, Taube says it's time we gave the right a try.

"Jews have to look more introspectively at what conservatism means today," he says. "We should have an interest in what it represents: a free market and individual freedoms. So for us, conservatism can have a feel-good message."

One has only to look around to see many high-profile Jewish conservatives, he adds: Apart from Frum, there's Barbara Amiel, Hugh Segal, Larry Grossman and Charles Harnick. In the U.S., so-called neo-cons like Irving Kristol and Norman Podhoretz are enjoying heightened statures.

While polls consistently show that 80 percent of Canadian Jews and 85 percent in the U.S. do not vote for right-wing parties, "a lot of young people are coming around," Taube says, "and that's good."

NCSY appoints director to bring youth out

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), the 40-year-old international youth wing of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, has appointed a full-time director in Montreal in an effort to revive flagging affiliation at a local level.

Although Orthodox in its orientation, NCSY will focus its initiative on building on its base of support of 230 members by "reaching out" to young people of all religious sensibilities, emphasized Ya'acov Blanshay, who took on the job last fall.

NCSY is divided into a "juniors" group for students in grades 6 to 8 and a "seniors" group for grades 9 to CEGEP.

"We want to build up up from the junior core of supporters," said Blanshay, 26, "and keep them right through to the senior level. We're looking for a comeback."

Already, said Blanshay, a graduate of Yeshiva University who grew up in Dollard des Ormeaux, several new initiatives have been launched.

A new local publication, the NCSY Scroll, is being published weekly and being piled high at local synagogues affiliated with NCSY, including the Beth Tikvah, Beth Ora, Beth Israel Beth Aaron and Beth Zion.

In January, NCSY in Montreal also instituted a program that's seen success since its 1993 launch in other cities: a Hebrew Culture Club aimed at Jewish students attending public schools. The program, being introduced at Lauren Hill School, uses a multimedia approach, guest speakers and other devices to expose the students in a "fun and informative" way to Jewish topics and issues.

In addition, said Blanshay, NCSY, beginning Feb. 3, began a bimonthly "TN'T" (Teens N'Torah) program at the Beth Ora Synagogue (and later at other synagogues), which will also use multimedia and other approaches to give young Jews more knowledge about their Jewish identity.

A fourth new initiative locally will be NCSY's (Life & Values Education) program, which uses popular videos as triggers for discussions on Jewish themes.

Complementing all of the above will be traditional local and regional Shabbatons (the next regional Shabbaton will be Jan. 31 to Feb. 2 at the Beth Zion) and social programs that have been the hallmark of NCSY.

Attracting new local members and financial support, Blanshay freely acknowledges, presents a unique set of challenges in Montreal, where NCSY, with a worldwide membership of 20,000, has never had the same level of success enjoyed in Toronto.

NCSY has also had to depend on the selfless support of a number of local individuals, such as Susan Portnoy and Leibel Wolfe.

The reasons for this "hit and miss" situation, Blanshay said, may be due to the fact that individual synagogues have their own youth groups, that Montreal families have moved to Toronto and the previous use of only part-time coordinators.

There may be another reason, too: the false perception that the NCSY agenda is to make Jewish youth Orthodox.

This is simply not the case, Blanshay said.

While one of NCSY's main thrusts is indeed to stem the tide of assimilation, it is to do so by instilling an overall sense of Jewish identity, to show that it can be fun, interesting , educational and even "cool" to feel Jewish, Blanshay said.

"That's why we reach out to both the affiliated and the non-affiliated," he said.

One of the strategies to make NCSY's newly revived presence known, Blanshay said, will be to take part in individual synagogue youth group events and develop a "synergy" that will later draw participants to specific NCSY activities.

More information on NCSY can be obtained by contacting Blanshay at the new NCSY number, 369-6999.

Senator apologizes for Hitler reference

OTTAWA — A Liberal senator's apology for saying Canadians should take their cue from Adolf Hitler when it comes to banning hazardous materials has satisfied Jewish groups.

New Brunswick Senator Joseph Landry, 74, shocked members of the Senate's energy committee during hearings last week into Bill C-29, which would ban the import and interprovincial trade of MMT, a potentially hazardous fuel additive.

"If [Hitler] wasn't sure on MMT, he would ban it outright," Landry said, adding that the Nazi dictator would not have hesitated to ban anything to block the building of a "supernation."

Canada should not take chances with material like MMT, he said.

"Maybe we should have a bit more Hitler in us."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) expressed outrage at the comments. BBC called on Landry to resign and on Prime Minister Jean Chretien to remove him from the Liberal caucus.

Landry issued a written apology the next day:

"I made comments that were, upon reflection, wrong and unacceptable. Citing Adolf Hitler to make a larger point was inappropriate, even though I intended in no way to imply support for Hitler or any of his own policies, which were repugnant and evil.

"I apologize without reservation for the comments I made."

CJC's Bernie Farber said Congress accepts the apology, which is "a good learning experience" for other politicians because it came quickly and shows that Landry is sensitive to language.

BBC's Ruben Friedman said his organization is satisfied with the apology.

"I wish he had reflected on it before he said it, rather than after," Friedman said.

CJC-P takes anti-racism program south to Idaho

By MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A group of anti-racism fighters from Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P) are taking their outreach program to two towns in northern Idaho, near the Canadian border.

Idaho is recognized here as an area of neo-Nazi activity and it is feared that the group will look to the mountainous, sparsely settled region near British Columbia and northern Alberta for recruitment of followers.

The CJC-P group will be lead by associate director Marilyn Berger and will include Holocaust survivors, Bronia Sonnenschein and Robert Waisman, as well as Sandy Dore, a representative of the B.C. Teachers Federation, Program Against Racism.

Using a grant from Multiculturalism B.C., the group has already travelled to five B.C. towns, speaking to high school students and to adult members of the communities.

In November they spoke in Creston, B.C., a region, according to Berger, "of particular concern because Holocaust deniers had moved to the area due to its proximity to white supremacist strongholds in northern Idaho. Hayden, Idaho, a few miles from Creston, is known as the centre for Christian Identity and the Phineas priesthood, both of which preach anti-Semitism."

Despite a raging blizzard, representatives from Bonner's Ferry and Sand Point in Idaho, both near Hayden, came to hear the CJC-P program and then shared the information with the city councils of their towns. Authorities invited the CJC-P to bring the group to the two communities and high schools in March. The Sand Point school is also inviting high school students from surrounding districts to participate.

According to a publication of the Coalition for Human Dignity in Portland, the white supremacist Identity calls for "all hybrid Jews to be repatriated from the (U.S.) republic territory, all their wealth be distributed to restore our people, and it shall be a capital offence to advocate or promote Jew Talmudic anti-Christ communism in any manner, or other crimes against nature."

Christian Identity, says the coalition publication, sees the Pacific Northwest as "the geographical space where God's kingdom will be established."

Together with other white supremacist groups, Aryan Nations and Christian Identity "seek to merge their groups with a nation state, a white controlled area purged of people of color, Jews and racial enemies." Creation of such a nation "will logically require formation of an army...."

Berger says her region is pleased that "its program is so highly regarded as to be invited into such an important region to confront racism and Holocaust denial." The Anti-Defamation League in Seattle had been trying to show a program in Northern Idaho for several years but with no success, she said.

Julian Bucher of Bonner's Ferry, who is the CJC-P contact in Idaho, told The CJN because of the few Jews living in the area, Christian Identity is not as violently anti-Semitic as it is further south, but he welcomes the presentation "so that our young people will know what went on during the World War II period. It's the last chance for our younger generations to get an education about the era."

Calgary school expands program

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Akiva Academy recently announced plans to launch its own junior high program beginning with Grade 7 in 1997-98, followed by grades 8 and 9 in the two subsequent years.

The new independent program will replace the joint Akiva Academy-Calgary Jewish Academy (CJA) junior high program, which has been in effect since the 1988-89 school year. Under the joint program, students were taught the Alberta curriculum at the CJA, and had the option of pursuing the Judaic studies program at either school.

"We're very excited about this," said Akiva's president Richard Steinberg. "This marks an important milestone in the history and growth of Akiva Academy."

Steinberg pointed out that some Akiva parents felt the Judaic portion of the joint junior high program did not meet the philosophical objectives of the school, largely because of a lack of instruction time. Whereas students now receive 6.5 hours per week of Judaics instruction, the Akiva junior high program will offer up to 15 hours.

"Our mission is to give a quality education based on Torah values," said Rabbi Allen Saks, principal of Akiva Academy.

The new program, he added, with a 50-50 split between Judaic studies and the provincial curriculum, will allow the school to provide a fully integrated Jewish-secular curriculum, in keeping with the goals and objectives of the school.

For the Akiva board, one of the primary considerations in going ahead with the junior high program was fiscal responsibility. In analysing all the information gathered, the board concluded that the school would not have to go to Akiva or to the community for additional funds to run the program.

Some upgrades to the school are planned to accommodate the incoming class and arrangements are being made to gain access to a science lab.

Additional secular staff with prior junior high experience will be hired to teach math, science, language arts and social studies, and a Hebrew language teacher is being sought.

Former director seeks return to war crimes unit

"I believe they felt I shouldn't have used numbers at all" or attributed some of the cases to Deschenes, he said. The criticism, Hobson claims, was engendered by "a combination of laziness and fear."

The loss of the Finta case, a criminal prosecution, and the publication in 1989 of Old Wounds by Harold Troper and Morton Weinfeld, describing the divergent views of the Jewish and Ukrainian communities, created a sense of fear among some in the department, he said.

At that time, the unit had not yet registered its one and only accomplishment, the deportation of Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens to Holland. The presiding judge Frank Collier did not release his judgment for two years.

"I didn't have that arrow in my quiver" to counter the skeptics, Hobson said.

In the intervening years, thanks in large part to the Supreme Court decision in the Finta case, which made criminal prosecutions virtually impossible, the unit has come over to Hobson's way of thinking.

A veteran litigator with a host of high profile successes under his belt, Hobson believes counsel must employ the proper case strategy to ensure success. When he and co-counsel Arnold Fradkin and Joe Rikhof took on the Luitjens case, they immediately set a court date eight months down the road. They spent the intervening time working on the case day and night.

Many believed it would be impossible to prove Luitjens lied when he entered Canada, because entry documents had been destroyed. But by laying the proper groundwork, Crown counsel were able to establish that Luitjens must have lied, Hobson said.

The war crimes unit has now given up on criminal prosecutions. In their place, it has promised the commencement of 12 deportation cases by March.

Hobson remains critical of counsel's strategy in current cases. He has written to those in authority pointing out what he sees as their errors. He pulls no punches in saying that despite the Luitjens precedent, prosecutors are not adopting the lessons from that case.

In the Luitjens proceeding, the first thing prosecutors did was set a court date, thereby giving a time frame for the resolution of all interim matters. Yet that lesson was not applied.

In one current case involving three alleged war criminals, Crown lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe filed motions seeking directions from the court and asking for the appointment of a commission to take evidence abroad. A court date was never set, thus creating conditions in which defence lawyers would be able to delay matters to the advantage of their clients.

Seeking directions from the court "takes time and it gives the opposition a crack at you and the opportunity to delay, delay, delay. When you look at the age of the people, that's [their] best strategy."

Hobson also questioned why Amerasinghe was assigned four cases, noting that each case entails voluminous work and time. Since Amerasinghe can take only one case to court at a time, the last one may not be heard for as much as four years down the road, he said.

Hobson's record as a lawyer, going back to the days before he joined the war crimes unit, is an impressive one, serving as the "go-to" guy when things got dicey for the government. He served as head of the legal services department of the Department of Transport and as counsel to the Mississauga Rail Inquiry in the 1970s.

His first involvement in war crimes cases took place in the early 1980s, when then solicitor-general Robert Kaplan pushed for the extradition of Nazi war criminal Helmut Rauca.

"It was a horrific case just in terms of the numbers and the principals and more important, we got the government to move on the case. I think Kaplan had to fight for a good number of years to get the Liberal government to show any interest in dealing with the case," he recalled.

When he left the unit, Hobson, still a senior counsel in the Justice Department, took on two of the toughest commercial tax cases he could find as a sort of way of proving himself. He won both.

In June 1995, he left the Department of Justice and opened his own office. Immediately he was involved as counsel in a highly publicized case involving alleged sexual assault by a high profile psychiatrist. He won that case as well.

For Hobson, prosecuting war criminals is a matter of principle.

"I used to feel about the issue in these terms: I live on a cul de sac. What would we think as a country if trucks rolled up in the middle of the night, loaded up the children and grandparents and took them away and no one asked about it anymore.

"It's the quintessential human rights issue," he said.

Campbell won't run

OTTAWA — Liberal member of Parliament Barry Campbell, one of three Jewish MPs, will not seek re-election in the next federal vote.

Campbell announced his "very difficult decision" in a recent letter to Prime Minister Jean Chretien. He's represented the Toronto riding of St. Paul's since 1993.

Dr. Carolyn Bennett, who ran unsuccessfully for the Liberals in the last provincial election, has announced she will seek the Liberal nomination in St. Paul's.

Early detection of speech problems is crucial

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Speech and language difficulties are the most common disorders affecting Ontario children and early intervention is crucial to their development, says a specialist in communication therapy.

"Acquiring appropriate speech and language skills early in life enables children to progress academically, socially and vocationally," said Sharon Cooper Cherniak, in an interview.

If disorders are left untreated, children are at risk of lifelong problems. A significantly higher percentage of school dropouts and an overwhelming number of adolescents who are in prisons demonstrate sub-normal speech and language abilities, she said.

Cherniak, who received a masters of health from the University of Toronto and is the mother of two children, was on staff in the speech and language pathology department at Brampton's Peel Memorial Hospital from 1989 to 1996. Government cutbacks last year led to the dismissal of all full- and part-time practitioners serving the pediatric population in the hospital's communications disorders department.

Due to the cutbacks, department closures and staff layoffs, some children will not be seen until they arrive at school, where intensive and individualized treatment is not always available, Cherniak said. Many children on hospital waiting lists must wait more than a year for an assessment or treatment.

Cherniak said mothers usually know there is a problem when the child is very young, but they are frequently told by family, friends and physicians that the youngster "will grow out of it."

Some of the early signs of difficulty, Cherniak said, are poor clarity, stuttering, difficulty following directions or finding words, hoarseness and a lack of attachment and responsiveness to caregivers.

Speech pathologist Sharon Cooper Cherniak in play therapy session.

She uses a chart outlining the signs to look for in the development of children from eight months to five years. As an example, an 8-month old baby who does not laugh, respond to familiar faces or startle to loud or sudden noises, should alert the parents to the possibility of hearing or speech/language difficulties.

Cherniak takes a holistic approach to therapy, which includes working on behavior and the child's interaction with peers. "Often therapy is geared to working with parents who learn a better interaction style, which facilitates their child's language development.

"Parents must advocate for services for their children," she stressed. To cope with the cutbacks, a group of parents has rallied for services for their children. The Ontario Association for Families of Children with Communicative Disorders now has many local chapters and the groups have been instrumental in preventing and delaying some departmental closures in the past two years.

In her private practice, Cherniak receives referrals from pediatricians, psychologists, family and other doctors, private schools and parents. She works directly with the child and the parents while communicating with the doctors and teachers.

"Many lifelong problems can be reduced or eliminated if parents will seek professional help when they first suspect that there is a problem and when they work together with the therapist."

AIDS research at Weizmann

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A gene that plays a vital role in the process of infection, the activation of the immune system and, perhaps, in the maturation of the HIV virus that causes AIDS has been discovered and cloned by Weizmann Institute researchers.

Their findings, which many other groups of scientists abroad have been trying to achieve, appears in the latest issue of the British journal, Nature.

Prof. David Wallach of the membrane research and biophysics department discovered the gene, called NIK, with help from doctoral students Nikolai Malinin, Mark Boldin and Andrei Kovalenko.

NIK helps remove a molecular "brake" that keeps the immune response in check.

Its discovery, said the Rehovot scientists, could lead to the development of drugs to regulate the immune system in a variety of diseases.

Drugs that enhance NIK's effects could be designed to boost immunity in immune-deficiency diseases, while drugs that block its effects might be developed to inhibit unwanted immune responses in autoimmune diseases, such as juvenile-onset diabetes, rheumatoid arthritis or multiple sclerosis.

"NIK activation is a crucial, first step in triggering the immune response," said Wallach. "Our findings hold potential for the design of future drugs to block or enhance the effects of NIK, although we still need to clarify the exact reactions that this molecule sets off."

It has been known for about 20 years that a protein called NF-kB belongs to a class of proteins, known as transcription factors, which "switch on" certain genes. NF-kB is a major molecule involved in the immune response, switching on several genes involved in immune and inflammatory responses to disease and infection.

While it is always present in all cells, its effects in healthy ones are usually blocked by an inhibitory protein known as IkB .

'Amicable' ceremony marks launch of new talks

BY DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) recently launched negotiations near Jerusalem aimed at broadening Palestinian self-rule in the territories.

The ceremony by Foreign Minister David Levy and PA senior negotiator Mahmoud Abbas, at the Kibbutz Ma'aleh Hahamisha guest centre west of Jerusalem, was described by participants as "amicable." Both Levy and Abbas expressed optimism that the ensuing eight parallel sets of negotiations on security and civilian matters would be resolved amid goodwill.

A one-on-one meeting between the two followed the opening ceremony.

"The two sides have taken upon themselves to uphold the agreements amid reciprocity and responsibility and to create an atmosphere that is conducive to the peace process," Levy said after the meeting.

Despite the optimism and amid general agreement that each set of talks should be held twice a week, concrete dates were not set to deal with the key Hebron pullback follow-up issues: the establishment of a Palestinian airport and sea port in Gaza and safe passage for Palestinians between Gaza and the West Bank.

Israel's concern in those talks is security, and it aims for provisions to prevent the smuggling of weapons into the territories or people into Israel.

The IDF will head the Israeli team for the airport and sea port, while the Internal Security Ministry will head talks on safe passage between the West Bank and Gaza, Foreign Ministry officials say.

One panel scheduled to be launched is "people to people," intended to increase encounters between different segments of Israeli and Palestinian societies.

Two panels addressing ongoing issues are to meet in Jerusalem. One is dealing with the Allenby and Rafah crossing points and is headed by the IDF. The other is the civilian affairs panel.

After the recent session, Levy declared that he and Abbas would meet monthly so as to supervise the different panels. However, it remains unclear what authority Levy will wield since the Palestinian track largely has been run out of the Prime Minister's Office. Furthermore, the IDF is to run several of the key panels.

Officials say they are confused by the differing titles on the Israeli side.

Cabinet secretary Danny Naveh, who flew back early from accompanying Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the United States to attend the Ma'aleh Hahamisha opening, has been named coordinator of talks with the Palestinians. According to foreign ministry officials, Levy aide Ya'acov Bardugo has been named co-coordinator. Levy himself is called head of the steering committee, a title that some describe as honorific.

To add to the confusion, the person who is considered the dominant Israeli negotiator on the Palestinian track is attorney Yitzhak Molcho, a friend of Netanyahu's.

Molcho headed the Hebron talks and officials say he will head the talks on the final disposition of the territories which begin next month and are scheduled to conclude in May 1999.

The next big date on the Palestinian track is March 7, when Israel is slated to stage the first of three additional pullbacks in the West Bank that are to be completed by the middle of next year.

Confrontation with Iran predicted

BY MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jeruslaem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Confrontation between Israel and Iran is inevitable, Labor Party leadership candidate MK Ephraim Sneh said recently.

Speaking to several dozen senior reserve officers at the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel, Sneh said that within a few years Iran will have nuclear weapons and will pose a threat to Israel.

The reserve officers included major-generals Uzi Narkiss, Doron Rubin, Avner Hermoni and Mordechai Ben-Shach.

Sneh warned that Israel will have to change its overall security concept, in accordance with the strategic Iranian nuclear threat. He noted that the Russian aid to Iran had reduced the time it needs to obtain operative nuclear ability. Iran can achieve this ability within a few years, he said.

Commenting on the situation in Lebanon, Sneh said that given the current situation there is no alternative to the deployment of the IDF and South Lebanese Army in the security zone. "Fighting the Hezbollah, which is supported by the Iranians, is the first — but not last — military confrontation between a western democracy and Khomeinistic Iran," Sneh said.

"The address to any settlement in Lebanon remains Syria. As long as there is no comprehensive agreement with Syria, there is no way but the IDF's direct threat on Syrian economic interests in Lebanon, to pressure them to curb Hezbollah," he added.

Sneh said there is an "unbridgeable gap" at present between the Syrian concept of the security arrangements, and Israel's security needs. He said President Hafez Assad's territorial demands are for the maximum, while his readiness for security arrangements and normalization are minimal.

"The international border proposed by the Syrians in the Golan — the Jordan and Kinneret line — is not defendable. Consequently, the chances for a comprehensive settlement with Syria are slim," he said.

Sneh argued that Israel must build a new Israeli-Jordanian-Palestinian axis in the region, to balance the Syrian-Iranian axis. The key to comprehensive peace in the region was and remains the agreements with the Palestinians, he stressed.

IDF to adopt new procedures

In wake of helicopter crash

BY ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — While it has not yet been determined why two Yasur (CH-53) helicopters collided on February 4, the Ivry board of inquiry has issued a series of recommendations to change procedures for flights carrying soldiers to Lebanon.

In its 10-page interim report, submitted to Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, the commission recommended that helicopters fly separately instead of in formation to reduce the risk of collision.

"We are completely adopting the commission's recommendations and these recommendations will be fully implemented," Mordechai said at a press conference attended by Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak and air force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu.

Mordechai immediately passed copies of the report to the government and the families of the 73 soldiers who died in the crash.

The report did not lay the blame on any person, but it uncovered a number of faults, from lax safety procedures to ambiguous flight instructions.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who was briefed in Washington on the report by Mordechai, said it appeared the report was "reasonable and orderly."

"I hope that this report will help prevent accidents like this in the future," he said, but added that he was not aware of any plans for dismissals in the air force.

The report ruled out harsh weather conditions as the direct cause of the crash and also said it was unlikely that arteriosclerosis discovered in one of the pilots in an autopsy was related to the accident.

Maj.-Gen. (res.) Ran Goren, a former deputy air force commander, told Israel Radio that the accident was likely a result of human error, but cautioned against hunting for someone to blame.

Some parents reacted angrily to the interim report.

Yoram Alpher, whose son Idan died in the crash, said it turns out that the 73 soldiers were killed simply because of utter disorder.

He leveled criticism at the findings of confusion over who records the flight rosters and ambiguous procedures on turning off aircraft lights.

Alpher also speculated that if there had been a co-pilot instead of two navigators, the pilot's mistake could have been averted.

The commission was given 45 days to present its findings, but was asked by Mordechai to submit an interim report after 10 days.

Ben-Eliahu said the Yasur squadrons had returned to full activity, but were now flying under increased safety restrictions.

"The most important thing about the interim report is to read its recommendations, since they are not aimed at giving a complete picture of the incident or level any blame in the incident, but ...to recommend what steps have to be taken as soon as possible and not wait for 45 days before we can start flying more safely and prevent such incidents in the future," Ben-Eliahu said.

The commission questioned 37 witnesses, visited the site of the crash and met with members of the helicopter squadrons in its investigation.

According to the interim report, a number of faults were detected, but it noted that none of them could be determined to have directly caused the accident.

The investigation said the two helicopters were to fly in "open formation," from the Mahanayim air strip to the Lebanon border and then separate, each to its own destination. It said that neither helicopter was designated "leader" of the formation and that neither pilot was sufficiently trained to be a leader.

The pilots were briefed before takeoff on extinguishing aircraft lights, which was to be done before crossing the border.

According to squadron practice, each was to have examined the other by trading places to make sure all lights were out. This policy was instituted to reduce the chance of the enemy spotting the helicopters. The inquiry found that the procedure for extinguishing lights was ambiguous.

The inquiry also found that the officer responsible for registering the flight roster did not arrive at the airstrip, thus no list of passengers remained on the ground. The list of victims was put together from the soldiers' units waiting for them in Lebanon, the inquiry said.

According to the inquiry, the helicopters circled above She'ar Yashuv waiting for permission to cross the border. At 6:56 p.m. they were given the go-ahead and half a minute later radioed back that they were crossing into Lebanon. At that moment, they disappeared from radar screens.

The inquiry found that pieces from both helicopters were located at both crash sites, corroborating eyewitness and radar accounts which reported a collision.

The commission now plans to widen the focus of its investigation, and will examine the makeup and maintenance of the helicopter squadron and flight crews. It will also examine the coordination between ground forces and the air force.

OHEL LEAH SYNAGOGUE, HONG KONG
Expressions of interest are invited from suitably qualified individuals for the position of Rabbi of Hong Kong's historic Ohel Leah Synagogue. Ohel Leah serves a vibrant multi-national Jewish community of residents and residents. The beautiful, circa 1901 Synagogue building, now undergoing restoration, is located in Mid-Levels, Hong Kong, adjacent to an ultra-modern Jewish Community Centre, which houses a religious school, a Jewish Day School and a lively schedule of recreational and community activities.
Reporting to the Council of Wardens, the prime responsibility of the Rabbi of Ohel Leah Synagogue will be to provide dynamic leadership to a mixed Ashkenazic and Sephardic Modern Orthodox Congregation numbering approximately 250 families and single adults.
The Rabbi will be expected to develop this community to its fullest potential, through active participation in the Synagogue services, appropriate community activities and adult education.
The successful candidate shall have a centrist philosophy and pluralistic approach to Modern Jewish Orthodoxy. In addition he shall demonstrate proven leadership skills rendering Halachic decisions with authority and in motivating adults and children.
Applicants shall have a University degree in an area not necessarily limited to Jewish studies, and have significant and distinguished pastoral experience. Fluent English and excellent public speaking skills are required.
An attractive salary, housing and other benefits package, commensurate with the applicant's background and experience, will be provided.
Applicants are requested to contact Dr. Glenn Frommer, Chairman, Council of Wardens, at the address below, to register their interest in this position.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 10

• Japan, coordinator of the Madrid multilateral working group on the environment, sent an invitation to Israel to attend the March 10 session to be held in Valencia, Spain.

• Politicians from across the spectrum criticized a group of parliamentarians and security officials who met privately last weekend to discuss Israel's policy in southern Lebanon.

Feb. 11

• According to a poll conducted by Ma'ariv, 79 percent of Israelis are opposed to a unilateral withdrawal of IDF troops from south Lebanon.

• Israel began the release from jail of 31 Palestinian female prisoners. The release of prisoners was the second approved by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu under the 1995 Interim Agreement.

Feb. 12

• Israel opened an Arab market near the Avraham Avinu Synagogue in the Jewish compound of Hebron, honoring a promise made in last month's agreement with the Palestinian Authority. The market was shut down three years ago after the rampage by Baruch Goldstein.

• Elyakim Rubinstein assumed his post as attorney general.

Feb. 13

• The air force attacked a suspected Hezbollah hideout in southern Lebanon.

• Media reported that Israel, Jordan and the United States are working on an arrangement to send Hamas leader Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook to Jordan instead of extraditing him to Israel.

Feb 14

• France and Israel agreed to step up cooperation in the fight against terrorism and to hold semi-annual dialogues on strategic issues. The new relationship was announced by visiting French Defence Minister Charles Millon and Yitzhak Mordechai in Tel Aviv.

• Bank workers went on strike as part of their campaign to establish a 5-day work week.

U.S. input sought

BY DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting last week with President Bill Clinton strongly contrasts with an unforgettable White House encounter five years ago between then-prime minister Yitzhak Shamir and U.S. president George Bush.

On the heels of the 1991 Madrid peace conference, Shamir spent the entire session with the world's most powerful man discussing which entrances to the State Department the Palestinian, Syrian and Lebanese negotiators would use and at what time intervals they would walk through the doors. It was a futile bid to separate the various Arab delegations.

The American officials emerged from that session fuming at how Shamir had wasted his own and Bush's time. But Shamir's insistence reflected Likud's view at the time. It wanted Washington completely removed from the substance of the talks, apparently believing that Israel would thus be better positioned to maintain its ideological opposition to any form of territorial compromise.

During Netanyahu's early trips to the United States last summer and fall, U.S. officials wondered whether he was a younger version of Shamir with an American accent.

After Clinton's first encounter with Netanyahu, the president reportedly commented to those around him that Netanyahu had spoken in the Oval Office as if he were the leader of a superpower and could dictate terms to the Palestinians.

It seems that last week's White House meeting was very different from the early encounters. Even if past Likud leaders wanted to keep the United States out of the substance of the peace process because they believed this would reduce the prospects of territorial compromise, Netanyahu realizes that a new Likud post-Hebron approach in dealing with the territories requires re-evaluating the role that the United States plays.

Having finally reached the conclusion that Oslo makes territorial compromise in the West Bank a fait accompli, Netanyahu now sees that it is critical to bring the United States into the nitty-gritty of the talks. This is what he did the other day at the White House, as he presented maps of his broad outlines for a final-status deal with the Palestinians and articulated his thinking regarding territorial compromise on the Golan, even though talks with Syria still seem far off.

enemy media are trying to say," Shara told reporters.

"Syria is ready to resume negotiations tomorrow if Israel abides by what was reached during the previous stage," he added.

Shara was speaking after he and Syrian Vice-President Abdel-Halim Khaddam had discussed the latest developments in the Middle East peace process with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

In two meetings with Netanyahu in Washington, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said she has no intention of going overboard in coaxing Damascus back to the talks, an Israeli official said.

Netanyahu, in his address, cautioned Anwar al-Assad to rein in Hezbollah, but did not condition the resumption of negotiations on such a move.

"We have not made the cessation of the proxy war against us... a precondition for the resumption of the talks. I could fairly well do that. I could say, 'We will not begin the talks unless Syria stops the proxy war that it can stop against us,' " Netanyahu said.

"If President Assad has taken, truly, a strategic decision for peace, we would expect him to disavow war as an option. But he has not discarded the option of violence in Lebanon, and we expect him to do so.

"And if President Assad does decide, soon I hope, that he chooses the path of peace, he will find us reasonable and cooperative partners. If he chooses the path of violence, he will leave us no choice but to defend ourselves and to defend our interests. I think such a choice on his part will be a prescription for tragedy."

Swiss restitution promised...

BY DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — When the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) met in New York, recently, discussions about Switzerland and the issue of missing Jewish assets took a new turn.

Strategizing over how to bring international pressure to bear on Switzerland will give way to dealing with the mechanics of transferring Swiss francs into the pockets of Holocaust survivors, officials said.

"Essentially, we've now moved into a situation where we are no longer trying to prove that restitution is due, but we're now at the point where restitution is beginning to happen, where the funds are actually being shifted," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

In 1992, the WJC and other leading Jewish organizations created the WJRO to secure compensation and restitution of Jewish property and assets confiscated during World War II.

Recently, three Swiss banking giants, under fire from critics over their handling of Holocaust victims' assets, transferred 100 million Swiss francs — $71 million (US) — into a Holocaust memorial fund.

The action marked the first concrete move to begin compensating Holocaust victims and their heirs whose families transferred their wealth to Swiss banks for safekeeping during the World War II era.

Jewish organizations claim Swiss banks hold up to $7 billion in such assets, but the banks say initial searches of their archives turned up only $32 million in unclaimed accounts.

Several Swiss businesses are now beginning to make their own contributions to the Swiss humanitarian fund. The industrial group Alusuisse-Lonza Holding AG said it would contribute "generously," and the Swiss Foreign Ministry said other business leaders were soon expected to make similar pledges.

The Swiss government and the Swiss National Bank have also given assurances that they will contribute to the fund in coming months.

At the WJRO meeting, officials said they turned to practical questions posed by a new phase in the struggle for moral and material restitution.

Meanwhile, New York politicians have gone ahead with plans to probe the issue of missing Jewish assets.

The New York City Council decided to examine ways to help Holocaust victims reclaim their wealth, and the New York State Assembly is set to hold a similar hearing.

The two bodies backed down from earlier threats of punitive steps to be taken against Swiss financial institutions after Credit Suisse, Swiss Bank Corp. and Union Banking of Switzerland set up the humanitarian fund.

Jewish groups also ruled out a boycott.

"We're now in a new mode of cooperation in winding down this unfortunate chapter in a manner which finally, in a symbolic way, seems to address the grievances of the Holocaust," Steinberg said.

...as anti-Semitism increases

BY FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Swiss Jews are confronting a mounting wave of anti-Semitism in the wake of international pressure on Switzerland to compensate Holocaust victims and their heirs for funds deposited in Swiss banks during the World War II era.

At the same time, however, Swiss Jews have found support from a largely sympathetic press and from Christian groups.

The surge in anti-Semitism was prompted by remarks made by Jean-Pascal Delamuraz on Dec. 31, the eve of his departure from the rotating Swiss presidency.

In an interview with the daily Tribune de Geneve, Delamuraz said the Auschwitz death camp " was not in Switzerland," adding that the growing demands of international Jewish groups to compensate Holocaust survivors and their heirs was nothing less than "blackmail."

While Delamuraz apologized after an international outcry, his New Year's Eve interview already had become something of a mobilization call to the country's anti-Semites, many of whom had been dormant in recent years.

The majority of Switzerland's 20,000 Jews support the WJC's efforts, despite the feeling by some that a more aggressive communal stance on restitution would fuel anti-Semitism.

The Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland, the communal umbrella group, though preferring a more passive role on the restitution issue in the past, has voiced its wholehearted support for the WJC and its "hard-liners" in New York.

Members of the country's Orthodox community, however, feel uncomfortable with stands taken by the federation and the WJC.

In a recent statement, six rabbis called on Swiss Jews to be very careful about their public statements.

There was some basis for their caution. In recent weeks, the offices of Jewish communal groups, along with other organizations and individuals, have received hundreds of anti-Semitic letters daily.

In comparison, "in normal times, we got one or two such letters a month," said Sigi Feigel, honorary president of Zurich's Jewish community, the country's largest.

Such letters usually are anonymous, but now they are arriving signed and include the addresses of the senders, Feigel added.

In addition, the Swiss newspapers contain pages of anti-Semitic letters to the editor, though their editorial pages are calling for the government to clarify the Swiss role during the war years.

Observers familiar with Swiss anti-Semitism say most of the anti-Semites are from the older generation. Many of them served in the Swiss army and still believe that the only reason Hitler did not invade Switzerland was because he knew of the Swiss army's full resolve to fight back, the observers say.

Story of 'Golden Peacock' coming to stage

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The life and times of Itzik Manger, the "Golden Peacock" of Yiddish literature, author of Oyfn Veg Shteyt a Boym, will be recreated on the stage of the Leah Posluns Theatre March 16.

That performance of Reflections of a Golden Peacock by New York actor Avi Hoffman is a gala in support of the University of Toronto Yiddish Studies Program. (Call 787-0526 for more information.)

Hoffman, who enthralled Toronto audiences with his one-man show, Too Jewish?, refers to Manger as "the lost poet" and hopes to restore the author's reputation in the new show.

Manger, a Romanian who-escaped the Holocaust, wandered the world and died in Israel in 1969 at the age of 68. He was a colorful character and Hoffman portrays him warts and all.

"He survived several love affairs and a lot of hard living, but he produced a rich body of work," said Hoffman.

Molly Picon sang Manger's lyrics in Yidl With His Fiddle and a series of his poems was the basis for The Megillah of Itzik Manger, which was a Broadway success.

The book for Reflections was written by Hoffman's mother, Miriam Hoffman, who is a professor of Yiddish at Columbia University in New York.

Hoffman himself considers Reflections a labor of love, since he grew up in the Kingsbridge area of the Bronx, where a vibrant Yiddish culture reigned and where he learned the writings and songs of Itzik Manger.

Besides the gala, Reflections will be presented at the theatre twice on March 18 for a matinee and evening performance.

In addition, Hoffman is repeating Too Jewish? at the theatre the evenings of March 15 and 17, and for a matinee on March 16.

Tickets for all shows, except the gala March 16, are available from Olive Eye Productions, 324-9413, Lasting Impressions, 635-0720, and Ticketmaster, 872-1111.

Just Clowning Around

Children's performer the Sphere Clown Band (above) will celebrate its 20th birthday with two concerts at the Minkler Auditorium, Seneca College on Feb.23 at 11 a.m and 2 p.m. The band's four albums have earned them plaudits from the press and their young fans. Their first album, I Can Do Anything, was a finalist for a Juno Award and their most recent tape Clowntown, earned the U.S. Parent's Choice Foundation Approval. The band is led by producer, performer and composer Patricia Silver. Silver designed the Children's High Holiday Services for the Beach Hebrew Institute and sings and plays for most holiday celebrations and services. She was also involved in last autumn's production of the children's Holocaust opera Brundibar at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Tickets for the birthday bash can be purchased from the Minkler Box Office at 416-491-8877.

Hapoalim offers notes

TEL-AVIV — An issue of up to $200 million (US) of guaranteed floating rate notes is being offered to foreign residents by Hapoalim International N.V, a subsidiary of Bank Hapoalim.

The first notes were recently issued on the London Stock Exchange, Rafi Ben-Ami chief representative for the bank in Canada said. There will be five other stages through July 1997. The final redemption of the Hapoalim notes is July 2006, with an option for earlier redemption in 2002.

Bank Hapoalim can now be found on the Internet at http://www.bankhapoalim.co.il.

Collecting names and more names thriving industry of the future

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What's in a name? To those companies looking to increase sales and market share, a name could mean the difference between becoming a market leader and corporate collapse.

This is where Jonathan Latsky, managing director of Syntony Marketing Inc., one of Canada's foremost database and list maintenance service bureaus, comes in.

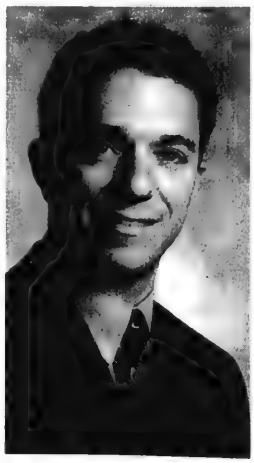
With an in-house list of 12 million residential and 1.7 million business names, Syntony can steer companies toward new customers.

Syntony's system also ensures that a company's client or prospect list is as up-to-date as possible. Companies can ensure they are not calling a special "do not call" list administered by the Canadian Direct Marketing Association (CDMA), he says.

Latsky says Syntony has been servicing "almost every major direct marketer in Canada" and is sporting 100 percent growth. Clients come from the telecommunications, catalogue, financial and publishing industries.

He describes his approach as "focussed diversification." Being focussed, he says, refers to Syntony's ability to provide data-base solutions to its clients and by diversification, Latsky refers to Syntony's ability to deliver in three product areas: list provision; a list update through merging and purging techniques and data entry and analytical services.

Latsky also helped put together many of the policies and structures that guide and govern Canada's information products industry. He founded the Database and List Council, a committee of the CDMA, of which he is a director.



Jonathan Latsky

The growth of the information products industry, says Latsky, is in part a by-product of the decline of print and electronic media as a vehicle for marketing. Companies have discovered that direct mail and telemarketing have proved successful when using up-to-date and targeted lists.

The key to list selection is identifying who is the most likely target to purchase a product or service. With approximately 100,000 lists on the market, this is no easy task, Latsky says. If you can narrow your target group by geography, income, or historical buying patterns, there is an increased opportunity for increasing market share, he says.

Among the company's 1.3 million business names are dentists, doctors, lawyers and veterinarians. Syntony can also direct a company's mailing campaign to 460,000 survey respondents across North America who have indicated that they operate a home business.

Syntony uses TargetSource, which includes hundreds of facts about two million Canadian households. All data was obtained by means of a direct mail survey.

In January, Syntony was purchased by GETKO Group Inc. a leading North American provider of publishing and information services for direct marketing companies. GETKO's objective was to enhance the presence of its existing Toronto office by pulling the two organizations together.

Bruce Dulberg, vice-president of GETKO Direct Response Group, who oversees operations of GETKO Group Canada, says "The acquisition makes GETKO one of Canada's largest data suppliers.

Founded in 1962, GETKO has established itself as a specialist in the home buyer market. Its divisions include Getting to Know You, the target home buyer welcoming program in North America.

GETKO is part of the CUC International family of companies which currently provides more than 60 million customers with access to a variety of services including home shopping, travel, insurance, auto, dining, home improvement, financial, and discount coupon programs. CUC International is a New York Stock Exchange-listed company, with more than 11,000 employees and revenues of over US $2 billion.

Midland Walwyn and Israel Bonds deal

TORONTO — Canada-Israel Securities, the organization that offers State of Israel Bonds in Canada, has entered into an agreement with participating Midland Walwyn financial advisors in Toronto and surrounding regions to provide full service investment advice to Bonds purchasers.

Also, participating financial advisors will provide a 50 percent discount on self-directed RRSP administration fees to any new client who purchases a State of Israel Bond.

"We can now offer the professional management advice that our clients require to manage their retirement savings," Marcia Cohen, in charge of RRSPs for State of Israel Bonds said.

Each participant will receive an exclusive monthly newsletter featuring a summary of the most recent business and investment developments in Israel plus links to other Israeli investment opportunities. Clients will also be offered savings on a variety of Israeli business publications and other Israeli-related items.

Jews have come long way in field of journalism

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Charles Lazarus

Peter Newman

TORONTO — When I dreamed of being a reporter, one of my inspirations was Nettie Magder, the Sudbury stringer who was the only reporter to cover the arrival in 1937 of the king and queen in White River in the far north.

The New York Times carried her report on its front page with a special citation about the quality of her writing. Soon after that, I got my first full-time job on a daily newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, 56 years ago.

At the time, there were few Jews in mainstream journalism and I became the first Jewish general assignment reporter ever hired by the Toronto Star in 1944. What a change in the picture today!

The mainstream media are alive with Jewish reporters, editors and columnists and in advance, I'm apologizing to those whose names I have inadvertently omitted.

Since I started with the late Nettie Magder, it's apt to report that she married Ted Harris, now deceased, editor of the defunct Montreal Herald. Their three children followed in their footsteps: Leon and Lewis are editors on the Montreal Gazette and Rosa Harris Adler of Ottawa is a magazine writer.

The journalism program at Ryerson Polytechnical University, the oldest in Canada, has always attracted a number of Jewish students, according to Paul Rush, acting chair. The one that comes to his mind instantly is Tamar Satov, editor of the Ryerson Review of Journalism.

It's heartening that Jews have sprouted like bean sprouts in a field in which as a Jew, I felt rather lonely at one time.

Those known far beyond Canada's borders include Morley Safer, of TV's 60 Minutes, Reuven Frank, retired head of NBC TV News, whose father was an editor of the Toronto Daily Hebrew Journal, Peter Newman, author and former editor of Maclean's magazine, Mordechai Richler, a journalistic gadfly and world famous author and Barbara Amiel, Maclean's columnist and wife of press baron Conrad Black.

Three Jews who made it to the top of the ladder were the late Martin Goodman, a reporter who became a top officer of the Toronto Star; Mark Harrison, onetime Star reporter who went on to be managing editor of the Montreal Gazette; and Shirley Sharzer, originally of Winnipeg, now retired, who was deputy managing editor of the Globe and Mail, and who did much to advance the cause of women in journalism.

Jewish columnists read by thousands

Among columnists whose material is read by thousands are Michelle Landsberg, David Lewis Stein, David Frum, Susan Kashtan, Rick Salutin, Adele Freedman, Naomi Klein, Joanne Kates, Ellen Roseman and Andrew Cohen.

Among those who have made their mark as editors and writers are Sydney Katz, Michael Posner, Harry Goldhar, Rabbi Reuben Slonim, Lorrie Goldstein, Rona Maynard, Jack Granek, Mel Sufrin (now director of the Ontario Press Council), the late Wilf Gruson, Susan Cole, Erna Paris, Paul Nowak, Elaine Dewar, Alice Klein and Sandra Gotlieb.

In the ivory towers of the editorial writing sanctum were the late Margaret Gould of the Toronto Star, and the late Ben Malkin, Ottawa Citizen.

A well-known specialist on the labor beat was Wilf List, Globe and Mail, now retired.

Jews in journalism are not confined to Ontario and Quebec. The late Hymie Koshovoy, managing editor of the Vancouver Sun, was a legendary figure. Val Werier, onetime managing editor of the Winnipeg Tribune, is still writing a column on current events for the Winnipeg Free Press, where Gene Telpner was also a reporter. Simma Holt, a Vancouver Sun reporter became a Liberal MP in Ottawa and an expert on the Doukhobors.

Three Canadian journalists well known in their own fields who went on to become editors of The Canadian Jewish News were Maurice Lucow and Patricia Rucker and the late Ralph Hyman. Among reporters who worked on The CJN were Dorothy Lipovenko and Ellie Tesher. In this article, I have not attempted to list the Jews who made their mark in writing for the Anglo-Jewish press, another subject in itself.

Entertainment writing continues to attract Canadian Jews, following on the career of the late acerbic Nathan Cohen, the Maritimer from Glace Bay, N.S., who was entertainment editor of the Toronto Star and host of TV's Fighting Words. They include Sid Adilman, Henry Mietkiewicz, Martin Knelman, Mira Friedlander, Pearl Sheffey Geffen, Tamara Bernstein, the late Frank Rasky (former editor of Liberty Magazine and onetime entertainment editor of The CJN), and the late Hye Bossin, editor of Canadian Film Weekly.

Sports writing figures included the late Joe Perlove, Toronto Star, the late Bobbie Rosenfeld, Globe and Mail, and the late Jack Kofman, Ottawa Citizen. Lorne Rubinstein and Al Sokol are more recent recruits.

The late Charles Lazarus was a well known scribe for the Montreal Star and a longtime stringer for The CJN. Another Montreal reporter, William Weintraub, is now a filmmaker and author.

Other reporters were Arnold Bruner, Bob Cohen, the late Carol Gault, Ed Parker, Sandy Nyman, Sam Crystal, the late Tommy Levine, Judith Knelman, Suanne Kelman, Jennifer Hunter and Stephen Kimber.

Those who left print journalism for TV include Alan Abel, Tom Alderman, Steve Paikin (son of McMaster University chancellor Marnie Paikin), CBC-TV auteur Larry Zolf of Winnipeg, and CBC-TV broadcaster Jason Moskowitz.

Maccabiah reunion in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Just two months before the July 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel, Maccabi Canada will be staging a national reunion in Montreal.

The reunion is for those who have participated since the first Canadian team attended the games in 1950. Invitations will go out to hundreds of past athletes, coaches, trainers and volunteers, as part of a heightened effort to raise the organization's profile before the games begin, said Abe Luxenberg, one of the organizers of the event.

Hockey legend Jean Beliveau, already set to make his second trip to Israel as chef de mission of the Canadian team, has agreed to serve as the reunion's honorary chair.

Luxenberg has been going over Maccabi material and records to get all the names together.

Other Maccabi Canada stalwarts, such as Joey Richman, Abe's wife Mary, Jeannine Harrison and Sammy Rouas, who is tracking down Sephardi veterans, are also doing their share.

"We have to find out where people are," said Abe Luxenberg. "It's a way to bring together the past and the present and to show who we are."

As it happens, "who we are" has grown from a 17-person Canadian team in 1950 (the first games to be held in the State of Israel and led by the late Fred Oberlander), to a team expected to number well over 200 next year.

And as the reunion will demonstrate, "who we are" also includes Canada playing a significant role in the revival of cultural and sports-related Maccabi activities in Eastern Europe, one of the world's most active areas before the Holocaust.

Among the individuals invited to the reunion is Joseph Sterngast, a neighbor of Luxenberg's who also happened to be a member of Maccabi-Krakow's championship cross-country motorcycle team.

Sterngast, along with his parents, six brothers and a sister, were all active in Maccabi-Krakow, but all but four brothers were murdered by the Nazis.

Maccabi-Krakow had over 2,500 members before the Holocaust.

Yvette Hus, a member of Maccabi Canada, was among a delegation of international Maccabi World Union cultural representatives who travelled to Poland last summer to witness the progress made in reviving Maccabi activities in Poland, despite the relatively low numbers of Jewish young people who now live there.

Today, the Maccabi-Krakow centre has 250 members, some of whom compete at the Maccabiah Games.

Individuals interested in participating in the reunion can reach Luxenberg at 514-485-9142.

Canada hopes to send women hoopsters to Israel

TORONTO — For years, Canada has sent a men's basketball team to the quadrennial Maccabiah Games in Israel, but this year, efforts are being made to send a women's team as well.

There are enough Canadian university, ex-university and club players to round out a competitive team, but with women's basketball a potentially new sport, Maccabi Canada has given proponents of the team the task of raising funds, said Chavi Weinroth, a member of the fundraising committee for the team.

The fundraisers' goal is $50,000. Anyone interested in contributing towards the team, or for more information, can contact Neil Rothenberg, administrator of women's basketball for Maccabi Canada, at 416-651-6354.

THE CHAMP TAKES A BOW

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) recently honored former Canadian heavyweight boxing champ George Chuvalo (left) with its national community service award, presented by BBC's president, Lyle Smordin. The award recognizes Chuvalo's determination and courage in overcoming personal tragedies and educating young Canadians about the dangers of drug use. Two of Chuvalo's sons died of drug overdoses while a third son committed suicide.

The Inside Back

Jewish groups hail verdict

BY CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Jewish groups are hailing the federal jury conviction last week of Lemrick Nelson Jr. in the killing of a chassidic scholar during the Crown Heights riots in 1991.

They also called for greater racial tolerance.

Nelson, 21, had earlier been acquitted in state court of killing Yankel Rosenbaum, prompting demands for a federal inquiry which led to the new trial.

"We are thankful that finally justice has been served," said Dr. Mandell Ganchrow, president of the Orthodox Union.

"Justice at last has been done," echoed Howard Teich, president of the American Jewish Congress Metropolitan New York Region.

"Our common task in light of this verdict remains that of building a more racially tolerant community."

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) also applauded the jury ruling. "The decision puts an end to five years of injustice," said an ADL statement. The riots "in which cries of 'Kill the Jews' rang through the streets of Brooklyn, resonated in the hearts of all of us."

The convictions "begin to put closure on these events."

The jury in the nationally publicized case, which included two Jews and three blacks, found Nelson guilty of violating Rosenbaum's civil rights. He reportedly buried his head in his hands and wept when he heard the verdict.

A co-defendant, Charles Price, 43, was charged with aiding and abetting the civil rights violation by inciting mobs to exact revenge on Jews for the accidental death of a 7-year-old black boy by a Chassidic driver.

The incident sparked four days of rioting, and the most serious outbreak of ethnic violence in New York in years.

Both men could face life sentences, though that is unlikely. Their lawyers argued they had been framed and set up as scapegoats.

One of the lawyers for Norman Rosenbaum, the slain man's brother, and for his family, joined the chorus of those welcoming the verdict.

"We are gratified at least a small measure of justice was done," Roger Adler said.

"All Americans, not just Jewish Americans, owe a debt of gratitude" to the justice system, he added. "We hope the government's efforts will continue to bring the others involved to justice."

Adler was not alone in seeking more prosecutions.

Rabbi Avi Weiss, president of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns-Amcha, issued a statement saying the verdict "was just the beginning."

"There was an entire mob which surrounded him," Weiss said, referring to Rosenbaum. "We will not be silent until all those responsible will be brought to justice."

SUPERDONOR MARKS 100TH BLOOD DONATION

A milestone last week for Toronto-area resident Peter Seligman, who made his 100th donation to a community blood bank. The 40-year-old father of three has been donating since high school. "This is an easy and important way to help hospital patients in our community," he said.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm 33, single, and have recently met an interesting man (which is no easy feat these days). I have been dating him for about a month. We speak on the phone almost every night, but so far have only seen each other on weekends. He always takes me to new restaurants and we spend the evening having dinner and talking.

My problem may seem silly, but it is annoying and I don't know how to go about fixing it without seeming petty. Jerry is always eating off my plate. Whether I order an appetizer, entree or dessert, I can always expect Jerry's fork right in there with mine, sharing my dinner. It's not as if he doesn't order his own food and I don't understand why he has to eat mine.

At first I thought it was strange, but now I don't want to go out to dinner with him because I become focused on this annoying habit and it ruins my evening.

Can you suggest an acceptable way of telling Jerry my problem. I don't really want to lose this guy.

Food Fight

Dear Food Fight,

Your problem doesn't seem so strange. You are a person who is territorial about your food. I can also understand that you may find it unappetizing to have someone put their used utensil into your meal.

On the other side of the coin, however, what Jerry is doing is not that unusual. Many people find sharing food a good way of trying out different dishes without ordering everything on the menu.

This is what I would call a "shtick" or quirk. We all have them and couples both married and newly dating have to learn to deal with them.

At your next dinner, when you see his fork coming towards your plate, tell Jerry that you are not the food sharing type. Don't make a big deal out of it — maybe you can bring it up in an almost joking manner. I'm sure he'll take the hint.

Remember, if it works out between you and Jerry you'll be sharing a lot more than just meals!

Israeli PM meets Hussein

Sensitive Jerusalem issues discussed

BY DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

AMMAN — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last weekend informed King Hussein that Israel intended to announce the plans to construct an estimated 2,600 Jewish housing units on Har Choma and an "approximately equal" number of Arab units in the Jerusalem area, according to participants in the talks.

In remarks at the joint news conference at the Raghdan Palace, the monarch sought to be diplomatic, but urged all to act "responsibly" to ensure that peace prevails.

When asked about his views on Har Choma, King Hussein replied, "I know how sensitive the issue of Jerusalem is. I hope nothing will happen that will explode emotions [in the city]. We have to think with our minds and hearts."

While trying to play down differences, when pressed further, King Hussein added, "Our principal position is to oppose any change [in eastern Jerusalem] that would affect or threaten the peace process."

Though he also admitted that differences existed, Netanyahu sought to allay King Hussein's fears, insisting Israel is committed to building both Arab and Jewish housing in the capital.

"It is true we have our respective positions. We also want to see Jerusalem as a city of peace between Israelis and Arabs," Netanyahu said.

"We do not view developing the Jewish parts and leaving underdeveloped the non-Jewish parts. We don't accept it. We have committed substantial amounts of money. Two weeks ago, we committed about $50 million to the Arab communities of Jerusalem. This same policy

Budget may benefit charities

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Last week's federal budget has garnered lukewarm support from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), but much praise in Jewish fundraising circles, where it's believed that changes to rules on charities may reap new benefits.

The budget unveiled by Finance Minister Paul Martin provides new tax breaks to entice individuals and corporations to donate to charities.

The government has proposed changes to the tax structure to make it more attractive to donate publicly traded stocks and bonds to charities.

Ottawa is also raising the limit on donations for which a tax credit can be claimed, from 50 percent to 75 percent of net annual income. The cap was raised to 50 percent from 20 percent in last year's budget.

Martin said the changes will be uniformly applied to all charities, and will help smaller charities, such as food banks and shelters.

'tremendous comprehensive help'

At the same time, the budget cut the limit on donations to Crown and Crown designated foundations, such as museums and universities, from 100 percent to 75 percent of yearly income. The move effectively places all charities on equal footing, and on par with those in the United States, Martin said.

The budget's moves on charities are a "tremendous, comprehensive help" on stimulating gifts, said Robert Kleinman, director of the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal.

Kleinman said the raising of the cap will help, especially when it comes to large gifts, but "key" will be the ability to donate public securities.

To stimulate those kinds of gifts, the budget cut in half – from 75 percent to 37.5 percent – the taxable portion of capital gains from the donation of publicly traded stocks and bonds to charities.

"We see that as a very positive message," Kleinman told The CJN.

The changes will also help spur large endowments, he said.

The budget is "evidence" of the government's retreat from social programs, while providing breaks for the public to fill in the gaps, Kleinman said.

He called on Quebec, which collects its own taxes, to "mirror" the changes in the federal budget. The

Israel, Mexico Join Forces

JERUSALEM — Israel and Mexico have signed an agreement to fight drug trafficking between their countries. The accord was signed last week by Foreign Minister David Levy and his visiting Mexican counterpart, Angel Gurria.

The signing ceremony coincided with an announcement by Israeli police that they seized more than 30 pounds of pure cocaine from Mexico last month at the port of Haifa. Seven Israelis suspected of involvement were detained.

Israel, China Boost Trade

JERUSALEM — Israel and China have agreed to boost bilateral trade and economic cooperation.

Israeli Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky met last week in Jerusalem with Chinese Vice-Premier Li Lanquing.

Israeli exports to China totalled $81 million (US) last year. Chinese exports to Israel in 1996 were $160 million.

The two sides agreed to set up joint committees to explore possible cooperation in agriculture, electronics, medical equipment and telecommunications.

Palestine Bourse Opens

NABLUS — The Palestinian stock market officially opened in Nablus last week.

Exchange officials broke into applause when the bourse's $2-million screen flashed the completion of the first transaction – 100 shares of the Arab Insurance Co. sold for four Jordanian dinars ($5.60) each. The exchange will be open for only one trading session a week during its introductory phase.

"This is an exciting moment," said Palestine Securities Exchange general manager Safwan Bataina, who promised to publish a market index, to be called the Jerusalem Index.

SADAT GETS COLD SHOULDER

President Anwar Sadat of Egypt, whose recent trip to Moscow was less than a resounding success, has suffered another rebuff at the hands of his Arab friends. The presidents of Syria and Sudan declined to attend an Arab summit meeting Sadat had arranged in Libya, apparently to entice the Sudanese into joining the Egypt-Libya-Syria Federation.

When Sudan's president announced he would not attend, Hafez Al Assad of Syria cancelled his visit. Observers said the incident spelled a further decline in Sadat's prestige at home and abroad.

Judge handling war crimes cases reprimanded

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Judicial Council has fired "a shot across the bow" of the Federal Court of Canada, censuring a judge who presided over three war crimes cases. The reprimand should serve as a warning to the court to get its act together, a senior spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress said.

The Judicial Council confirmed a longstanding Congress contention that Justice James Jerome conducted cases involving alleged Nazi war criminals much too slowly, said Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee. Their critique came at a time when the minister of justice has asked the auditor general to consider merging the Federal Court with the Tax Court.

"I hope the Federal Court uses the war crimes cases to show they can proceed rapidly with their caseload," he said.

In a letter to Jerome, a panel of the Judicial Council's senior judges said his "handling of the conduct of the proceedings...fell short of the standard of diligence which could reasonably be expected of a case management judge...The fact remains that at the end of a year only one day of argument, on what was then one of three outstanding motions, had been heard and no decisions rendered. This reflects a lack of initiative in carrying out your case management responsibilities."

The Judicial Council rejected the suggestion that Jerome had a "biased motive," adding the judge's conduct was not serious enough to warrant a formal investigation.

The Judicial Council had been asked to look into allegations there was "serious delay in the conduct of the citizenship revocation proceedings" involving alleged Nazi war criminals Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass.

Jerome removed himself from the cases last spring following a controversial meeting between Ted Thompson, assistant deputy attorney general, and Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac. At the meeting, Thompson complained about the slow pace in Jerome's court. That meeting became subject of a stay proceeding launched by lawyers for the three men. Justice Bud Cullen granted the stay on the grounds of judicial interference, saying proceedings were advancing at a normal pace. That decision was subsequently overturned by the Federal Court of Appeal.

While not criticizing Cullen directly, the Judicial Council quoted from the Appeal Court decision that blasted Cullen's finding as "patently wrong. The pace of the proceedings...had been so slow as to certainly give rise to a suspicion that justice was not rendered with reasonable diligence."

Former Ontario chief justice Charles Dubin, in a report prepared last August for the minister of justice, came to the same conclusion, noting that "over a period of 13 months, only one day had been assigned for the argument of these three pending preliminary motions." He pointed out that "in cases such as these, delay is welcomed by the [alleged war criminals] who do not want to lose their citizenship and be deported."

The Judicial Council suggested Jerome's conduct in the cases might be "symptomatic of larger problems, possibly of a systemic nature, in the trial division of the Federal Court."

In other developments, the case involving alleged war criminal Joseph Nemsila went before the Federal Court of Appeal in Ottawa last week. Nemsila's lawyers were appealing a decision by Jerome in which he ruled that Nemsila could not be protected from deportation proceedings simply because he had been domiciled in Canada for five years. Earlier, an Immigration adjudicator had ruled that Nemsila could not be deported — even if he lied on entering Canada — because he had acquired domicile under Canada's old Immigration Act.

Three Jewish organizations, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, intervened in the case on the government side.

Congress lawyer Ed Morgan argued that protecting a domiciled individual from deportation, if he lied on entry, would be contrary to Canadian policy. Parliament couldn't have intended to give such a "bonus" to people who enter Canada by fraud, he said. Rather, they should be penalized if they entered Canada by lying.

Furthermore, immigration law should not be interpreted to give domiciled individuals greater rights than citizens, such as Jacob Luitjens, who was stripped of his citizenship and deported for lying about his wartime role as a Nazi collaborator, he said.

Finally, he argued that Canadian law must be interpreted in light of its international law obligation not to give asylum to war criminals.

The Appeal Court reserved its decision in the case.

The concern for unity among Jews occupies us more and more.

The peace process in which Israel has now been involved officially and publicly for almost five years has been the catalyst. It has forced us to confront issues that penetrate to the very essence of the beliefs we have held unchallenged for millennia, which helped sustain us in our dispersion, beliefs about ourselves, our purpose — God's purpose for us — on this earth.

Two governments of different stripes and three prime ministers have now sat at the table with Palestinian "partners" who not long ago were reviled as murderers, and who are still reviled as such by a great number of our people.

The internal Jewish debate over the nature and even the wisdom of the peace process has raged, more or less, since "the handshake" 3½ years ago in Washington even to the point, alas, of the shedding of blood.

The negotiations are slowly, but inevitably, bringing us to a watershed in modern Jewish history. Readers of The CJN do not need me to elaborate upon the gut-wrenching uncertainties, the risky compromises, the many-layered complexities or the epoch-making ramifications with which Israel's negotiators must deal.

Nor do our readers need me to elaborate upon the individual and national anxieties that lie in wait, unwelcome, unsettling, unfamiliar possibilities, on either side of that historical divide.

Looking to the future, as the negotiators and the people of Israel are forced to deal with increasingly "ultimate" issues, we can expect the rage within the debate to intensify, the division within the people to become more entrenched and our unity even further fractured, God forbid.

The concern for unity among Jews occupies a great number of people. The CJN receives numerous letters, phone calls and written submissions expressing the same concern.

More than once, I have been referred to the writings of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Hacohen Kook.

Some CJN readers may remember that aspects of Rabbi Kook's teachings have been twice discussed in the pages of The CJN by Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University.

Lockshin wrote two deeply insightful essays about Rav Kook, expounding upon some of the core beliefs of the late first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine, while at the same time dispelling some of the more romanticized notions about Rav Kook's teachings that have arisen, undoubtedly through longing and wishful thinking, over the past six decades.

So moving is Rabbi Kook's verse, so uniquely touching is his style, so ever more vital today are key parts of his beliefs, that we again offer to our readers some of his writing.

Hearken O My People, one of the many haunting poems written by Rav Kook, speaks directly and unabashedly of his particularistic love for the Jewish people. It is an uncompromising message of Jewish unity. The late Rabbi Morris Silverman provided the translation.

"Hearken, O my people!
From the very depths of my soul
I speak unto you;

From the core of life where lies the tie
That binds us one to the other,
With devotion, deep and profound,
I declare unto you

That you, each one of you,
All of you, the whole of you,
Your very souls, your generations,
Only you are the essence of my life.

I live in you, in each of you, in all of you;
In your life, my life has deeper, truer meaning;
Without you I am as naught."

The poem contains 10 more stanzas. I have never encountered a poetic equal that expresses such unrestrained tenderness, love and mystery for the profundity of the feeling of Jewish kinship.

Recently, a friend of mine, Thomas (Tommy) Goldstein gave me a four-page compilation of notes prepared by Dr. Moshe Klein on a small but inspiring sampling of some of the writings of Abraham Isaac Hacohen Kook. I am pleased to reproduce two small portions from Klein's notes given to me by Goldstein.

I am aware that the concepts themselves in Klein's notes require background familiarity and explication. But I am not, nor do I wish to leave the impression, in any way, that I am a student of Rabbi Kook. Would that I were. But I am not. I do not presume to interpret his writings, or explain them or place them in any scholarly or comparative context.

I simply wish to share with the readers of The CJN what was generously shared with me: something beautiful and special, aspects of "the spiritual and humanitarian teachings of Rav Abraham Isaac Hacohen Kook."

Even without any background, even if the reader understands the brief excerpts only at the first, most superficial level, they stand alone. They are worthy contributions to the hope for unity among Jews.

(The notes are in Hebrew. The translation is by The CJN alone with apologies for any shortcomings to Klein and, of course, to the integrity and rare beauty of Rabbi Kook's writing.)

"When Man grasps that unity pervades all of Creation, and that he is connected through true unity to all that has been created, then will he love his fellow Man...

"The awareness of the spiritual unity of our world...can inspire the soul to good deeds.

"Through these good deeds Man elevates and 'improves' himself; in the process he will also 'improve' mankind, indeed, he can 'improve' the entire world because he stands with a sense of oneness to all of Creation.

"The world is ultimately elevated and made better by individual acts of goodness.

"The highest form of good deed is love, the love of other beings and the love of all that was created...

"We must therefore be alive to the fact that such an all-encompassing grasp of life perceives the unity coursing throughout all of creation; it obliges Man to seek heightened spirituality all his life, to grow in love and in good deeds, and to strive constantly for self-improvement and for the improvement of the entire world through individual acts of goodness."

At a time when the concern for unity among Jews occupies us more and more, Rav Kook's teachings are important to read again. MBD

Columnist lays bare the 'secret' of domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many people deny it, but violence against women does exist in the Jewish community, says Toronto Star columnist Michelle Landsberg.

"Jewish women are like Cleopatra — Queen of Denial," she quipped recently at Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's third annual Women for Women breakfast. The goal of Women for Women, a project of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, is to raise public awareness of battered women.

Domestic violence is a Jewish secret, Landsberg said. "Every persecuted minority would rather hide a secret than betray men. We are, however, no longer persecuted. We are not in danger in Canada, so it is safe to come out of the closet with the truth.

"There is just as much abuse in our community as in any other, yet I still get calls from women who said that when they described their abuse to a rabbi, he told them to keep peace in the family. I have received letters from men denouncing me for saying that men in power could be abusers. This is typical of the silence that is going on and this silence must stop," said Landsberg, a board member of Lanark Interval House and Women's Global Issues Directory.

She praised Hadassah-WIZO for speaking out and saying "that this level of violence is not acceptable. Behind every successful Jewish man, I want a Jewish woman to say, 'Don't you dare shut us up.'"

Joan Grant-Cummings, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and a women's health activist who deals with such issues as violence, poverty and all forms of discrimination said it is "frightening that so many women in Ontario stay in abusive relationships because of a fear of poverty... We must connect as a community of women and understand that the goal is equality and peace."

The whole act of working with women and drawing strength from them "is what leads me from day to day. Women give a lot of nourishing and counselling, but we never fill back our own wells after we have given and given. It is like that in every culture — women are taught to give," she said.

"Today's event," said Landsberg, "makes me happy that ... the passion for justice is bubbling up in the Jewish community."

Presentations were given to ASTEH, Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing, operated in partnership by Jewish Women International and Jewish Family and Child Services of Toronto; and North York Women's Shelter which provides short-term emergency shelter for assaulted women and their children.

TORONTO — It's up to individuals and schools to institute a "zero tolerance" policy on violence, a leading expert said here recently.

Society today not only condones violence, it "celebrates" it in sports, culture and even pastimes, psychologist Peter Jaffe told over 250 educators, counselors and social workers at a day-long conference on violence prevention, co-sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

Jaffe, director of the London Family Court Clinic and an authority on violence and youth, painted a grim picture of the amount of violent acts today's teens are exposed to.

Young people see violence everywhere: in professional hockey, movies, television and even video games, 95 percent of which depict violence, Jaffe said.

Violence "is seen as a proper resolution of disputes."

Prime time TV shows average five violent acts per hour, he said. But Saturday morning cartoons depict 25 violent acts each hour. Teens spend up to four hours a day in front of the tube, he added.

By the time a child graduates from elementary school, he or she sees 8,000 murders and 100,000 acts of violence on TV, Jaffe noted.

The correlation between excessive viewing of violence and violent behavior "is as high as the correlation between smoking and cancer."

And every year, society's threshold for tolerating violence is ratcheted up.

"The good old days are gone. There's a whole new culture that reinforces all the wrong values. We need 1997 solutions to 1997 problems," Jaffe said.

The good news, though, is that the "majority" of young people — as individuals — want to end violence.

Jaffe called on educators to institute zero tolerance for violence, and promote safety and violence prevention programs for young people.

Campbell stepping down after one term as MP

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One thing that will occupy Barry Campbell after he steps down as the MP for St. Paul's is to figure out why young Jews don't seem attracted to public service.

Campbell, one of just three Jewish members of Parliament, announced recently that he won't seek re-election in the next federal vote. He's bowing out for personal reasons, saying he wants to spend more time with his wife and two young sons.

An ace Bay Street lawyer who specialized in trade law, Campbell, 46, won the bellwether riding of St. Paul's in 1993 when he defeated Isabel Bassett, now a Conservative member of the provincial legislature.

He joined veteran Jewish MPs Herb Gray and Sheila Finestone, all on the government side of the House of Commons. After the '93 vote, the number of Jewish MPs fell from five to three.

Campbell served as vice-chair of the Commons' powerful finance committee, but gave that up a year ago to become Parliamentary Secretary to Finance Minister Paul Martin, a position in which he'll continue until the federal election.

Campbell is worried that Jewish representation at the federal level will drop after he leaves.

"Parliament is a microcosm of Canada," he told The CJN. "When a Jewish voice is lost, it matters. Our sensibilities and perspective are lost."

Campbell's not sure what he'll do after he steps down, but he will examine why there seems to be little interest in the Jewish community in serving at the federal level.

He says he'll work with Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith on "how we can spur young Jews to political activity. [Jewish] organizations do leadership training. Why not in politics?"

Some have argued that Jews have become more complacent politically because they are wealthier, more secure and more assimilated than a generation ago, Campbell points out. "But if that is so, why is 10 percent of the U.S. Congress Jewish?"

Campbell's "very difficult decision" not to run again was outlined in a letter to Prime Minister Jean Chretien, who responded by thanking Campbell for his service. Chretien ends the typed letter with the handwritten sentence, "And I hope that you will be back one day."

Barry Campbell

Campbell's decision "was not about lack of job satisfaction. It was a tough job, but I found it enormously rewarding.

"To those who wonder whether [being an MP] can make a difference, after just one term, I can say, 'unequivocally, yes.' "

Campbell says the community shouldn't be too worried about fewer Jewish MPs. "I'm happy to report that issues which are important to the Jewish community — Nazi war criminals and hatemongering — also matter to the entire community. They're not exclusively our issues anymore."

Dr. Carolyn Bennett, a Metro physician and health care activist, has announced she will seek the Liberal nomination in St. Paul's.

In the last provincial election, Bennett was the Liberal candidate in St. Andrew-St. Patrick, which was won by Bassett.

Zareinu becomes affiliated with BJE

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Zareinu, a school for children with special needs, has become officially affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

Zareinu serves children from infancy to 11 or 12 with a variety of special needs, from the learning disabled to those with greater difficulties, such as cerebral palsy, autism and Down syndrome. There are currently 34 students at the school, with a waiting list.

It has an active infant intervention program. In fact, it's part of the M.E.D.E.K. program, which has shown remarkable results with children with cerebral palsy.

While the affiliation will have no immediate financial benefit for the school, it will mean that Zareinu will have full access to BJE services, such as its media centre, audio-visual collection, pedagogic library and specialized personnel.

What's more significant, according to Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director of the BJE, is that the school is "now recognized as being part of the mainstream – that it is seen as part of the Jewish community by the Jewish community, through its educational arm."

The community recognizes there is a need for such a school, Rabbi Witty said, and "welcomes and supports it, and is ready to acknowledge what is being done there, not just by a group of parents, but as a part of the community."

The affiliation of Zareinu, like that of Shearim Hebrew Day School, a school for those with learning disabilities, and like the report on special education that is winding its way through the UJA Federation offices, is "all part of the growing recognition of the necessity in a large community like Toronto to provide for those with special needs," he said.

Danny Gordon, president of the board of directors of Zareinu, told The CJN that he is very excited by the development.

"It is a very important step, because it shows that we are more and more accepted in the educatable community."

Zareinu, he said, is "still Toronto's best kept secret. We have had to spend so much time fundraising, that we haven't gotten the word out about what we actually do."

Gordon said he hopes the increased profile the school will have through affiliation with the BJE will have an impact on "the core number of people who support United Jewish Appeal, and perhaps will help us [financially]."

Co-principal Carol Goldman said the affiliation will have the greatest effect on the parents, who will feel that at last "their kids are recognized and valued – a part of the community. That is important, because they have felt so isolated."

Jewish education urged as top priority

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ensuring that youngsters receive a Jewish education should be one of the top priorities of all Jews, a panel of educators recently agreed.

The panel, sponsored by Nishma, a centre for Torah study, consisted of Rabbi Aaron Hoch, educational director of Aish HaTorah; Martin Lockshin, professor of Judaic studies at York University; Rabbi Mordechai Sevy, educational director of Or Haemet Sephardic School; and Rabbi Moshe Yeres, rosh hayeshivah at Yeshivat Bnei Akiva Or Chaim.

Raising children who want to keep Torah for emotional, rather than merely intellectual reasons, said Rabbi Hoch, should be one of our main concerns.

"Imagine a society where a majority of the people relate to mitzvot as an opportunity for growth."

This can be done, he said, by introducing studies that leave the children with "a passionate desire to be shomer Torah. If tzedakah is a pleasure then there are no pressures."

Rabbi Sevy agreed that educators must create a situation "where kids are nurtured constantly so that they know what choices to make when they grow up.

"What constitutes a proper education is debatable, but what we do know is that people who are educated have a strong identity, are socially acceptable and they speak the language well. When we are educated, we understand each other," he said.

Numbers show that graduates of Jewish educational institutes have more commitment to Judaism and less intermarriage, said Rabbi Yeres.

A 1994 study done by Yeshiva University, he said, showed that the home environments of graduates of Jewish schools are more Jewish oriented.

"There is a correlation between the level of Jewish commitment and Jewish education. Even graduates who come from non-observant homes have an increased level of observance if their Jewish education continues through high school," he said.

He added that 15 percent of American Jews have visited Israel, compared to 89 percent of day school graduates.

Lockshin said that although Halachah should not be changed, "if Orthodoxy would change its message, it would become more relevant.

"Orthodox Judaism does not speak the language of other Jews. It talks to itself, of its own issues and does not address the issues of society at large."

We must talk about the issues that everyone thinks about, such as poverty, he said. "We can say Jewish things about these subjects. Orthodox Judaism needs leaders who talk the intellectual language of the world we live in. We must be willing to go out to society and talk their language figuratively and literally.

"I am not suggesting changing Halachah, but it would be a wonderful message if we promoted an agenda that included more respect for women.

"If Orthodox institutes cannot have men and women sitting on their boards together, why not have an all-women board?" he asked.

Atmospheric pressures

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu seems to travel constantly under conditions of politically stormy weather. Even as he was in the skies last week, winging back from what was widely viewed as a successful trip to Washington, new and potentially explosive atmospheric pressures were building above his office in Jerusalem.

The ill winds from the "Bar-On affair," in which allegations swirl of a sinister, odious, back-room deal linking the Hebron redeployment with the easing of criminal charges against Aryeh Deri and the appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general, were rising higher and higher. The police are investigating. The breezing toxins may yet asphyxiate the government.

More immediately pressing, however, was that Netanyahu had to navigate the turbulence surrounding Har Choma.

Har Choma is the picturesque hilltop of pine trees, low-lying spikes of grass and pink cyclamen on the southern slopes of Jerusalem between Kibbutz Ramat Rachel and Bethlehem, which has been earmarked for a new housing project of some 6,500 homes.

Accompanying the prime minister's return home was the rumor that he had promised to defer if not cancel the housing project. Despite his denials, publication of the rumor seeded more clouds of controversy. Pressures are gathering from all sides:

• Some coalition partners are threatening to leave the government if the project does not proceed.

• In typically ambiguous and ominous fashion, Yasser Arafat told reporters that "patience has limits." He compared the plan for Jewish housing on Har Choma to "laying a siege against the Palestinian people." Faisal Husseini, for his part, escalated the rhetoric saying the Palestine Authority (PA) would view a decision by Israel to build on Har Choma as a "decision of war." The threats cannot be dismissed. Israel's security officials have confirmed the possibility of a violent Palestinian reaction. If the tunnel-related violence of last September is any precedent, a new outbreak would likely result in even greater casualties, including possibly, the peace process itself.

• Not surprisingly, other Middle East countries are also warning the government of Israel. In his meeting last week with Arafat, Turkey's Prime Minister Necmettin Erbekan stated: "Jerusalem is an issue not just for the Palestinians, but for all the Muslim world."

• Judging by their unmuted criticism of the decision last week by Israel's cabinet to speed up the building of roads in and around East Jerusalem, the Americans too would likely condemn any new housing built on Har Choma.

As usual, and as ever, the problem is complex, the issues are many and interwoven and the implications far-reaching. In Israel, discussion is divided, heated and lively.

Netanyahu cannot ignore the "counsel" of allies; nor can he cede Israeli policy-making over to them. He cannot ignore the sensibilities of the Islamic world toward Jerusalem; nor can he disregard Judaism's first call on Jerusalem. He cannot ignore the possibility of Palestinian violence; nor can he surrender to such threats. He cannot govern with unreliable coalition partners; nor can he unilaterally rescind coalition promises.

Sometime during the next few days, one may perchance notice the silhouette of a man walking purposefully and pensively on Har Choma's ancient slope. It could be Benjamin Netanyahu looking with care and with courage, amid the pines, the grass and the flowers, for a peace of Solomon's wisdom.

Objects to use of "non Jewish" Jew

Re: "Czech Community Threatened With Extinction." (Feb. 6) I was born in the Czech Republic and I come from Yaacov Glickman's "non Jewish" Jewish variety, being a practising Roman Catholic. So are, and were, the great majority of so called Cesky Zide (Czech Jews), wherever they lived and live!

I graduated in medicine from Prague's university and from one in Paris. But I also graduated from 43 months of concentration camps and was liberated by the International Red Cross.

May I explain to Glickman his misunderstanding of the Jewish question in the Czech Republic or former Czechoslovakia.

In 1918, the Czechoslovakian Republic was formed: Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia had western culture and religions; Slovakia, semi-eastern culture and different languages; and Carpath Ukraine, eastern Russian culture and language.

Glickman visited the Czech Republic. The population of this republic is: Bohemia 76,301, Moravia and Silesia 41,250 people of the Jewish religion. Out of these 117,551 Jews, 43,000 declared Czech nationality, 37,000 declared Jewish nationality and 35,000 German nationality. Glickman's article speaks about 357,000 Jews. He erred by including Slovak and Ukraine Jews.

The Slovak and Ukraine Jews were influenced by eastern culture. A great majority were Orthodox Jews who spoke a Jewish dialect and the "educated" language, Hungarian. On the other hand, the "Czech Jews spoke primaily Czech (some of them German). the "non"-Czech Jews in the west spoke German. That means 43,000 Jews spoke Czech and 72,000 spoke German.

As the "Czech Jews" considered their religion a secondary issue, they mixed freely with the Czechs and intermarried with the Christian population. This had never been done in the eastern part of the country. It is therefore not uncommon, that the president of the parliament is from a mixed marriage and doesn't practise the Jewish faith; nor does the minister of culture.

Therefore, I very strongly object, Yaacov Glickman, that you call me a "non Jew" of Jewish variety. I had suffered a long time for this injustice, lost my parents and sister, but I object to being called by a Jewish man, a "non Jewish" Jewish variety.

Serious flaw tarnishes Shine

The film Shine is the story of my younger brother, David Helfgott, a prodigious pianist and a very endearing person. His triumph as a performer over the adversity of mental illness is a story which deserves to be told, and the film Shine tells this story admirably.

However, there is a serious flaw regarding the true facts. This regards our late father, Peter Helfgott, who is depicted in the film Shine as a violent and destructive man, a portrayal far from the truth.

The cinematic license of tailoring facts to heighten the story has caused suffering to living members of Peter's family, and to all those who knew and loved him.

Looking for Churchills, not Chamberlains

Today much of the Jewish world is euphoric about the fact that the state of Israel has either given away, or promised to give away, strategic parts of its territory to Yasser Arafat in return for scraps of paper. In 1938, British prime minister Neville Chamberlain returned from Munich, after appeasing Hitler and giving him the Sudetenland for peace, waving a scrap of paper and saying "peace in our time."

We all know the results: the most destructive war in human history, in which 1½ million innocent Jewish children perished.

At the time, most of the British people believed Chamberlain and were quite euphoric. Winston Churchill, however, realized that the road of appeasement taken by Chamberlain was the road to war, not to peace, but Churchill had a minority of supporters. Today among the Jewish people, we have no shortage of euphoric Chamberlains, but where are our Churchills?

Tragedy leaves an emptiness

As I read the names of the 73 Israeli soldiers and crewmen killed in the helicopter disaster over Shaar Yashuv in Israel's Northern Galilee, I was overcome by a tremendous feeling of loss and emptiness at such a senseless tragedy.

Once again I ask myself the same difficult question. How could this have happened? These were young brave soldiers in the prime of their lives. Once again, Israel and Jews around the world must mourn and grieve as one family. As the years pass, the casualties are increasing and the statistics are frightening. Let us all hope and pray that the recent tragic events will be the last as we continue to strive for an everlasting peace in the Middle East.

Israel cannot let its guard down

Looking at tomorrow's IDF

By MICHAEL MARGOLIAN

For David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, protecting the Jewish state was first and foremost a matter of ensuring its survival. As leader of a small, vulnerable country surrounded by hostile Arab neighbors bent on its destruction, Ben-Gurion faced an uphill struggle.

The fact that, nearly 50 years after its establishment, Israel's survival is no longer at stake suggests that Ben-Gurion and his successors have laid a firm foundation for the country's long-term security. Emphasizing self-reliance and close ties with the United States, particularly over the last two decades, Israel has acquired the freedom to act when challenged and to prevail militarily should conflict erupt.

The New-Old Middle East

Sustained efforts to build a strong defence and changes in the regional balance of power have left a favorable legacy to the current prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu. The Arab world is divided and lacks a military benefactor. Defence expenditures across the region are on a downward trend, marking an end to the conventional arms race that fuelled Arab-Israeli wars over several decades. The peace treaty between Israel and Egypt remains intact, supplemented by agreements with Jordan and the Palestinians. Syria has joined the peace process, albeit reluctantly, after failing to realize its goal of "strategic parity" with Israel. For their part, die-hard rejectionist states like Iraq, Iran and Libya have been marginalized as Israel makes diplomatic inroads in North Africa and the Arabian peninsula.

All this is good news; yet the Middle East remains a rough neighborhood, fraught with dangers. Relations with Jordan's King Hussein aside, there is scant evidence that the peace process constitutes genuine reconciliation. For many, Israel is still perceived as a foreign presence in the Middle East, a state built on the conquest of Arab land. Moderates have chosen the path of accommodation with Israel, but this decision is more a political strategy than a change of heart, derived from a healthy respect for Israel's strength, as well as general war-weariness after years of conflict. Should Israel fail to maintain military superiority in relation to its regional rivals, its security situation could deteriorate rather quickly. Thus, despite the absence of an existential threat, Israel cannot let its guard down. It must still contend with a range of challenges, from terrorism to the proliferation of mass destruction weapons. Moreover, it must begin preparing now for the threats likely to arise in the early part of the 21st century.

Missiles, Poisons and Bugs

Throughout its history, Israel has placed a premium on offensive warfare. Compensating for lack of strategic depth and limited resources, Israeli military doctrine has emphasized sufficient firepower to achieve a decisive victory against any combination of Arab forces. The priority has been to destroy the enemy's offensive capacity and ensure that hostilities take place as far away from Israeli territory as possible. Israel's offensive capacity also serves to deter attacks from occurring in the first place, threatening opponents with devastating retaliation.

Iraqi SCUD attacks against Israel during the Gulf War and the knowledge that these missiles could have been armed with chemical or biological warheads have had a profound impact on Israeli defence planning. The Gulf War experience highlighted the vulnerability of Israeli population centres in the missile age and the limits of relying on offence alone to safeguard the country's security. The next war could see more reliable, accurate missiles carrying much deadlier explosives. Indeed, Syria's ambassador to Egypt recently warned that his country would retaliate with chemical weapons if Israel threatened to use its nuclear arsenal. Libya has been building a huge underground factory that reportedly will be able to produce hundreds of tons of mustard and nerve gas annually. Iranian attempts to obtain nuclear weapons technology are also a serious concern. While offensive weapons are still necessary to deter such threats, Israeli military planners now believe that protecting the homeland is equally necessary to assure victory into the next century.

Despite new technology and advanced weaponry, the core strength of the IDF will always remain the character of its soldiers. Seen here is a young officer standing before the monument to Mordechai Anielewicz and the Warsaw ghetto uprising at kibbutz Yad Mordechai. [Israpet photo]

Offence and Defence

In the coming years, Israel will receive new F-15I fighter aircraft that will enhance its long-range strike capability. Israel is continuing development of the Jericho II ballistic missile, as well as unmanned aerial vehicles for reconnaissance and targeting purposes, and highly accurate precision-guided weapons. Israel is also reported to possess a substantial nuclear arsenal, and statements by Israeli leaders threatening "massive retaliation" in response to a chemical or biological attack have reinforced this belief.

So much for the offensive side of the equation. As far as defence is concerned, substantial resources are being allocated to systems that offer the hope of protecting key military installations and the civilian population from missile attack. The Arrow theatre missile defence system, funded jointly by the United States and Israel, is critical to the success of this approach. Unlike the Patriot, which came to prominence during the war, the more capable Arrow is designed to intercept incoming missiles far from Israeli territory and be effective against chemical and biological as well as conventional warheads. Fully operational by the turn of the century, it will be the world's most advanced missile defence system deployed in the field. While no system can provide an impenetrable shield, the Arrow should significantly reduce the level of damage and casualties, in the event of an attack.

Arrow is one of several high-technology investments that Israel is relying on to enhance its future defence posture. For example, the Amos satellite program may one day provide Israel with an early-warning capability from space, lessening Jerusalem's dependence on U.S.-supplied data. The Tactical High-Energy Laser, a collaborative effort with the United States, is intended to destroy short-range rockets like the Katyusha. Israel also plans to purchase new fighter aircraft to supplement its current fleet of F-15s and F-16s. Additional hi-tech initiatives include a new anti-tank weapon, a pilotless plane that locates and destroys enemy missiles just after they are launched and a training facility in the Negev that can accommodate state-of-the-art equipment.

An Expanding Universe

Evolving military doctrine and equipment modernization aside, Israel's defence relations abroad are another important element of its overall security. The peace process has broken down longstanding barriers with friends and former enemies alike. Now, in addition to Israel's traditionally close ties with the United States, Israeli companies have signed or anticipate defence contracts with Russia, China and India. Britain has upgraded its defence relations with Israel, signalling a more even-handed approach to the region. Israel and South Korea are considering joint production of F-16 components.

Perhaps the most significant bilateral relationship established in recent years is that with Turkey. Two military agreements were signed in 1996: The first provides for joint training and manoeuvres as well as intelligence-sharing, while the second oversees cooperation between the countries' respective defence industries. Despite opposition from Islamic Prime Minister Necmettin Erbakan, the agreements have survived, allowing Israeli pilots to train in Turkey's vast airspace and, according to media reports, carry out reconnaissance missions along Turkey's borders with Syria, Iraq and Iran.

One Step Ahead

To safeguard its security into the 21st century, Israel will need to stay ahead of the competition on a variety of fronts. In the past, efforts to gain the upper hand have included surprise attacks against distant targets, such as the raid against Iraq's nuclear reactor or the bombing of PLO headquarters in Tunis. At home, the government has instituted a program to outfit every Israeli with a gas mask, an initiative no other country has attempted. In December, Israel revealed yet another innovation, the establishment in July 1995 of the Egoz Unit (egoz is Hebrew for walnut) specializing in anti-guerrilla warfare. Over the last 18 months, the unit has launched dozens of operations against Hezbollah in South Lebanon. Adopting the tactics of its enemies, Egoz carries out ambushes of the Iranian-backed terrorists before they can strike at Israeli forces. Egoz members are in Lebanon for the entire length of their service, know the terrain extremely well and can therefore respond to events on the ground with maximum speed and flexibility.

Since the state was founded in 1948, Israel has done whatever was necessary, first to survive and ultimately to defeat its enemies. Israel is secure today because its forces are superior to those of any potential rival, whether in terms of the calibre of its soldiers, the capabilities of its equipment or the inventiveness of its strategy and tactics. In the years to come, these advantages will be more important than ever, as the politics of the region continue to be volatile and Israel's adversaries acquire increasingly sophisticated weapons. One hopes that by the turn of the century, negotiations will bear fruit and Israel will finally be at peace with its neighbors. That said, given the threats which are bound to persist, a certain amount of vigilance is only prudent.

Israel's new battle: the environment

ISRAEL DIARY V

In Israel everyone talks about religion, but only recently are Israelis beginning to talk with concern about their environment and the impact the expanding population and economy are having on nature.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The Israel Union for Environmental Defence (IUED) is an environmental advocacy group of lawyers and scientists, which, since its inception in 1990, has grown from two lawyers and a secretary to a staff of 20, including seven lawyers and six scientists.

"We don't do academic papers; we go out and solve environmental problems. We give free legal and scientific aid to anyone or any group who requests it," explains spokesperson Daniel Fish.

They go to court armed with the scientific background to argue the issues. "About half our complaints come from the public, half we initiate." Complaints range from a noisy neighborhood to the stewardship of Israel's coastline.

An activist organization, it has as a main target the actions of private industry and government. How is the government reacting to this new challenge?

Governmental ministries that have the greatest direct impact on the environment are the ministries of Agriculture and the Environment, combined under Raphael Eitan, and the Ministry of Infrastructure, headed by Ariel Sharon, which controls the creation and sustaining of industrial parks, the building of roads, the water supply and all major projects which have a direct impact on the environment.

One very clear problem is that, in Israel, agriculture and the environment have long been opponents, since farming techniques are among the greatest polluters. While the previous Labor government wasn't keen on challenges, "we had them going in a positive direction," says Fish. "Now that has all but disappeared. The bottom has fallen out. There is a completely negative governmental attitude. Like the 104th U.S. Congress, they are very anti-environmental." And what of the future? "Looking around, in four or five years, we will reach the point of no return."

Some victories in their six years? One concerned the development of marinas along the Mediterranean coastline. Beach front belongs to the public, yet regulations permit the privatization of beach front where hotels are built close to the beach. They then open marinas, closing off the public use of beach front and polluting the water. Two such projects were stopped, one in Tel Aviv, one in Haifa.

Another was a huge case against Haifa Chemicals, which dumped 1½ million tons of toxic waste into the Kishon River leading into Haifa Bay. The company wanted to pump untreated waste directly through a pipeline into the water. The IUED stopped the pipeline and forced the company to find a land-based solution, requiring treatment of the waste. There is presently only one treatment plant in Israel.

A third forced controlling toxic waste by suing government agencies and forcing them to adopt the stricter standards of the United States. "In fact," Fish notes, "we have strict laws but they are not enforced."

And victories of the common man? "We went to court on behalf of the residents in Hadera who lived near a firing range that blasted away at all hours of the day or night. We won that — the firing range now has to have acoustic protection, and they have limited and reduced the noise levels."

Failure? "The trans-Israel highway, a road that will cut a swathe of asphalt the size of a mid-size city. We brought a suit in the Supreme Court and lost on technical grounds. The road is now under construction. You can see it at Beit Shemen, but we are still fighting.

"We are also fighting the construction of a huge industrial park smack in the middle of the Galilee. After a four year legal battle we thought we had won, but the last government approved its construction at the last minute. There is an injunction to halt work at the moment and we think the government will back down" (Other groups have joined this fight, including both Arab and Jewish residents of the area and the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. The park, already sprouting a huge smokestack of the Phoenicia Glass Works, would sit above two huge water reservoirs, part of the National Water Carrier, as well as near many tourists sites such as the mishnaic centre of Tzipori. A recent Jerusalem Post article on the controversy points out ironically that Rabbi Judah HaNasi, redactor of the Mishna, moved to Tzipori for its clean air.)

A tale of kidnapping

A portion of my year is spent travelling to various places where I have been invited to lecture. I have met a lot of people and become acquainted with many of their life stories — but none was stranger than what I heard on my last journey to New Jersey.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I was the Shabbat guest of a family who are very involved in the synagogue. The father, John Heidema, had a terrifying experience, for last summer, he had been kidnapped while vacationing in Ecuador.

A former professor of chemistry turned computer scientist, Heidema had treated his older daughter to a birding trip — first to the Galapagos Islands and then to the rain forests of Ecuador. That is where the tour members were attacked and overcome by armed bandits, who took Heidema prisoner in the hope of obtaining a ransom for him.

The family was not remotely capable of raising the $5 million demanded, but they did obtain some money and Heidema's wife flew to Quito to see whether somehow the people holding her husband could be persuaded to let him go for less than they had demanded. Needless to say, it was a harrowing time for her and the family, something that was more than matched by what John himself endured.

Dragged through the woods, underfed, recaptured after a failed escape, John began to doubt that he would ever come out alive. His ability to communicate with his captors was minimal and thus his solitude was increased. They had an obscure novel in English which they gave to him and which John read several times from cover to cover; then he analyzed the words, their structure — anything to keep him mentally alive. His inner strength was his anchor.

Perhaps, he said, he might have established some bond with his captors, but his inability to converse fluently with them kept this possibility to a minimum. Shut off from all outside contact for 38 days, ill and emaciated, he let his mind take control of his weakened body, and that is how he persisted against all odds.

A telephone call by the captors — uneducated men who had no knowledge of modern tracing techniques — led to John's rescue. The call was traced, and eventually a special unit of the Ecuadorian police stormed the hiding place, killed the kidnappers and freed John. He is a modest person and was at first reluctant to share the experience. As with many tales of suffering and persistence, one can only listen and wonder. It seemed to me that, in circumstances of this kind, we discover new resources — call them religious, call them psychological, call them basic instincts. Perhaps they are a combination of all of these.

Kidnapping is not just a modern curse. The Torah already knew of it and the rabbis construed the eighth commandment, "You shall not steal," as referring to the theft of persons rather than things (a crime that is covered elsewhere). "I was stolen from the land of the Hebrews," says Joseph (Genesis 40:15), and I remembered that story as I listened to John, relating his own experience in his gracious New Jersey home.

Adults who seek encouragement

Our son Noah, now 24, was born with Down syndrome. Despite some serious physical impairments and the obvious mental limitations, he has grown into adulthood with a rather normal emotional range and happily, a well-honed sense of humor.

By Shel Krakofsky in London

If he doesn't know something or doesn't want you to know something, in answer to the question, he emphatically and confidently answers, "You tell me!"

For example: "Noah, did you solve the world's financial problems and take your shower today?"

"You tell me!"

As the years have passed, like so many similar children who have grown into adulthood, his status within the community has changed. In official reports, we have seen him variously described as Mongoloid, retarded, special, disabled and the currently more acceptable term, challenged.

To him and his family, the only name for Noah that counts, is Noah. It is the only description that fits.

It has always been easier to raise consciousness about the young without employing similar strategies for the elderly. There are laws in place for children in need of protection from parents who practise abuse and neglect. There is no such effective legislation to safeguard adults from their children.

While society will set up programs for the disabled and disadvantaged while they are young, they are too often abandoned in terms of their needs and dignity as these people become older.

There are no Help Wanted signs out there for people like Noah, despite a desire to have adults in his situation contribute to the society around them. Entertaining these people with outings and the like isn't enough to give them the sense of worth they want and deserve.

In Ontario, there is a changing governmental policy toward variously handicapped adults. Like others, Noah benefitted from an enlightened and compassionate educational program that included special classes and some integration with the regular students both in primary and high schools. However, while regular students may proceed to further education and training, current laws and funding only provide for Noah and his former classmates to go to school until age 21.

All those years, our son, like similar children, were being groomed to function as adults in sheltered workshops. Noah, for one, enjoyed his time in training and was very proud of his work and the camaraderie of his co-workers. This has all changed as the sheltered workshops are rapidly being phased out.

As part of the philosophy of allowing these adults to be integrated into the larger community, they are being encouraged to find jobs in standard workplaces. Finding the right work for Noah wasn't easy. He was let go from two jobs because he either couldn't do the work consistently quickly (washing dishes in a restaurant) or he considered the job inconsistent with his own image ("I don't do floors!").

Fortunately, for a few hours a week, Noah has found employment for the past two years as a volunteer stamping store logos on bags at a bakery and helping prepare lunches at a retirement home thanks to the patience and kindness of those involved.

There are well-meaning and sincere people on both sides of the debate regarding adult workshops versus low or non-paying jobs at conventional job sites. Only the latter is now possible.

These people are among us and thirst for validation as adults and as human beings. Like everybody else, they need signs and words of encouragement indicating that their abilities and accomplishments are important and valuable.

So if you are in a position to employ any of these adults, even if it's only as voluntary work for a couple of hours a week, remember that some mitzvot are easy.

You can call the appropriate department of your federation or contact the Canadian Association for Community Living at 416-661-9611 for information about providing work. Job coaches are often available to provide supervision and training during the initial period at no cost to the employer.

The Kirshner File

The Rosenstrasse incident is recounted

On Feb. 27, 1943, the week-long Rosenstrasse incident exploded. Fifty-four years on, it is now recognized for what it was — an unprecedented and successful protest of open German resistance to Nazi anti-Semitism, as well as a remarkable example of civil disobedience.

By Sheldon Kirshner

The incident was triggered when the Nazis decided to round up and deport the remaining Jews of Berlin so that the Final Solution could be completed. Ten thousand Jews were arrested, and within days, the vast majority were deported to their deaths.

Two thousand of these Jews, wed to Christians, were temporarily spared. They were locked into a holding centre on Rosenstrasse, in eastern Berlin, to await developments. Their fate hung in the balance. By 1943, the Holocaust was in full swing. The year before, 2.7 million European Jews had been murdered, and now the Gestapo thirsted for more blood.

But this was not to be, as the German wives, husbands and children of the incarcerated 2,000 Jews converged on Rosenstrasse to plead for their lives. The demonstrators were scattered by the police, even threatened with being shot, but they persisted. In the face of their indomitability, the Nazis backed down, and the Jews were released.

The Rosenstrasse incident, a telling footnote in the annals of Nazi Germany, is the subject of Resistance of the Heart (W.W. Norton & Company, $40), written by Nathan Stoltzfus, an American scholar.

Based on archival material and reminiscences, Resistance of the Heart transcends the event which is at the centre of this fine new book. In essence, it is a story about intermarriage and the bizarre permutations of Nazi policy toward Jews.

In the decades leading up to the Third Reich (1933-45), Jewish assimilation in Germany took the form of intermarriage. At the turn of the 19th century, 9.3 percent of Jewish men and 7.7 percent of Jewish women married outside the faith. By 1933, the average rate had swollen to 44 percent. The figure fell by 39 percentage points in 1934, but by 1935 some 35,000 Jews lived in intermarriages.

In 1943, intermarried Jews, of whom there are estimated to have been 27,000, were virtually the only officially registered Jews still left in Germany. That they survived was due not only to their German spouses but to the capricious character of the regime's racial regulations.

Under the 1935 Nuremberg Laws, anyone with four Jewish grandparents was considered a Jew, while anyone with four grandparents not on Jewish community rolls was deemed a German. Those who did not meet these criteria were categorized as mischlinge. In general, a person with two Jewish grandparents was defined as a mischling of the first degree, while a person with one Jewish grandparent was known as a mischling of the second degree.

In the Nazi scheme of things, mischlinge of the second degree were allowed to keep their citizenship but were kept out of positions of power. They could join the Hitler Youth and serve in the armed forces, but were disqualified from receiving promotions.

Stoltzfus cites the case of Werner Goldberg, a mischiling of the second degree who was baptized at birth. Goldberg, whose photograph had appeared in a newspaper with the caption " The Ideal German Soldier," was in the German army when it attacked Poland in 1939. But in 1940, as a German of Jewish origin, he was expelled from the Wehrmacht. On Hitler's order, however, mischlinge soldiers who had distinguished themselves in battle were excused from this provision.

These divergences caused a great deal of confusion. The Nuremberg Laws, for example, banned further marriages between Jews and Germans and tolerated existing German-Jewish unions. But when a number of Jews in such marriages were victimized during Kristallnacht in 1938, a prominent German professor whose wife was Jewish lodged a complaint with a senior Nazi official, and the rules were modified.

Thereafter, intermarriages were divided into two separate categories. In "privileged" intermarriages, the children had been baptized as Christians. In "non-privileged" intermarriages, the offspring had not undergone baptism.

The regime also doled out special dispensations to so-called Schutzjuden. Numbering in the hundreds, they were classified as protected Jews whose skills were required by the nation.

These "equalizations" had no overall effect on Nazi policy with respect to the vast majority of German Jews, and did not endure. In January 1941, the Nazis agreed to treat mischlinge as Jews. And in September of that year, all Jews over the age of six, save exempted mischlinge, were forced to wear the bright yellow Stars of David on their outer clothing.

Late in 1942, Nazi zealots resolved to solve the "Jewish problem" once and for all. A decision was made that intermarried full Jews, as well as intermarried half-Jews who wore the Star of David, were to be separated from their partners and deported. This included Jews in so-called privileged intermarriages.

Massive arrest of Berlin Jews

German industrialists who employed such Jews were not pleased. They regarded Jews as reliable and conscientious workers and were loath to lose them. Hitler was not moved. On Feb. 2, 1943, Joseph Goebbels, the propaganda minister whose fondest wish was to render Berlin Judenrein, ordered the massive arrest of Jews in the capital. By that point, Jews in intermarriages and their spouses were extremely vulnerable, having been forced to register with the Jewish community.

On Feb. 24, Hitler commemorated the founding of the Nazi party with a speech promising again that the war would lead to the annihilation of the Jews. Four days later, the roundups commenced, touching off the Rosenstrasse protests.

Under pressure from the demonstrators, Goebbels released the intermarried Jews and mischlinge. Astonishingly enough, 25 who had been shipped to Auschwitz were sent back to Berlin. Two months after the hue and cry of Rosenstrasse, Goebbels declared Berlin Judenfrei.

Why did the Nazis succumb to the protesters? There are at least two reasons. They feared that the deportations would sow unrest and disunity at a time when the war was going badly. In January, U.S. bombers had attacked Germany for the first time. And in February, the Stalingrad debacle had occurred.

Furthermore, Stoltzfus speculates, there was an increasing need to conceal the Holocaust, the revelation of which would have damaged public morale. As he puts it: "A public discussion about the fate of the deported Jews threatened to disclose the Final Solution and thus endanger the entire effort."

Hitler supported Goebbels' decision to call off the deportations. Goebbels, he declared, had responded correctly to the "psychological" pressures of the protest.

So the Jews of Rosenstrasse survived the war. But most German Jews who had not emigrated were hardly as fortunate.

'Good' has won the day

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

That Moshe broke the first set of tablets of the Ten Commandments is a biblical fact. His motivation in doing so is the subject of widespread rabbinic speculation. Perhaps it was out of anger at the sin committed by the children of Israel when they worshiped the golden calf. Perhaps it was out of despair and resignation as he viewed their betrayal of God and His commandments. Perhaps it was to protect the people by destroying the luchot haedut, the tablets of testimony, the only written evidence of their covenant with God. Perhaps it was only a physical manifestation of what the people had themselves already done: broken the Torah and its commandments. The lessons are many and all are instructive.

I am not bothered by why Moshe broke the first set of tablets. I am puzzled by why he didn't break the second tablets as well! After all, the people sinned time and time again — idolatry, murder, promiscuity, interpersonal strife and challenges to God's authority. Why weren't the second tablets broken in response to any of these sins?

While our sages offer many insightful answers, one in particular is most instructive for us today. A comparison of the two times that the Ten Commandments are recorded in the Torah, once in Exodus 20 and once in Deuteronomy 5, reveals that there are a number of words and phrases that are different.

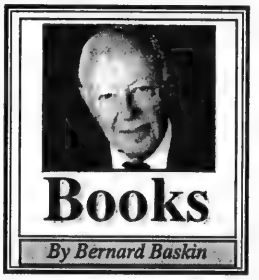
One of the differences is that the word "good" appears in the second version. (See Deut. 5:16 where we are promised that as reward for honoring our parents lema'an yitav lach, "it will go good" for us. Pardon the grammar, I'm making a point.) This word is absent from the first. It has been suggested that this word is the secret of the survival and endurance of the second tablets,

How? Questions, doubts, challenges to authority and disobedience are natural elements of human behavior, especially as it relates to religion and God. If, in response to these challenges, religious authorities, teachers and parents respond only with midat hadin, the cold and harsh letter of the law, the results are often disastrous. Such was the nature of the first set of tablets. Moshe realized that imposing the law on a wayward people, as represented by the cold tablets of stone, would be unsuccessful.

If, however, he could show his people lema'an yitav lach, how good it is to be a Jew and how beneficial and meaningful the observance of mitzvot really are (as represented by the word "good" on the second tablets), then he might be more successful in wooing them from the attractions and seductions of idolatry.

In fact, despite many challenges and setbacks, the "good" has won the day and the mitzvot inscribed on those tablets and the relationship between God and the Jews that they represent have endured for more than 3,000 years. Whether they will continue to endure is up to us. Do we appreciate the goodness of our heritage? Are we teaching our children the goodness of Jewish life and Torah observance? Are we living according to the psalmist's prescription, "consider and see that God is good; happy are those that take refuge in Him" (Psalms 34:9)?

Rabbi Dratch is spiritual leader of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.



A question of faith

Permission to Believe: Four Rational Approaches to God's Existence;
Permission to Receive: Four Rational Approaches to the Torah's Divine Origin*, by Lawrence Kelemen (Feldman Publishers (paperbound)).

Is it rational to believe in God? Is atheism logical? Is murder always wrong? Who or what gave design and order to our astonishing universe? Is evolution more than a popular theory? Why are the Jewish people still alive when other religions and peoples have disappeared? Why do good people suffer? Is the Torah of Divine origin? Do archeological findings confirm the Torah's authenticity?

These complex but axial questions are among others that are posed in these two slender volumes by an Israeli professor of philosophy at the Neve Yerushalayim College of Jewish studies in Jerusalem.

Dr. Kelemen, an exponent of Orthodox Judaism, and well versed in the findings of modern science, maintains that although proof is impossible in answering most basic religious questions, there is for the intellectually curious and open-minded individual, "permission to believe."

Several of the reasons that the author posits for the existence of God seem reasonable and cogent. For example, he suggests that "one who wishes to affirm eternal, universal ethics such as 'murder is always wrong' must admit the existence of a supernatural moral arbiter, a God. There is just no other source for such ethics."

In addition, he asserts that the widespread acceptance of the Big Bang Theory of the origin of the universe means that time had a beginning and implies Divine intervention. Perhaps 16 billion years ago, the universe started at a fixed point in space and exploded outwards creating the galaxies and other space objects. There is nothing incompatible with this view and with a Supreme Being as Creator.

Moreover God is manifest in the almost unbelievable complexity of the universe. "Man has never succeeded in building a computer that can match DNA's data-storage and reproductive capabilities. Neither has he ever constructed a television camera that can mimic the human eye's brightness range, focal flexibility, and image processing abilities. Nor has he yet assembled a communications network with as many specific connections as a single human brain. The human body dwarfs in complexity any object man has ever designed."

The eminent scientist, Fred Hoyle, made the statement that believing the first cell originated by chance, is like believing a tornado ripping through a junk yard full of airplane parts could produce a Boeing 747.

When the author, however, deals with the matter of evil, many readers will be bewildered and dismayed. Why do Jews suffer persecution and martyrdom? Because they have assimilated to the outside culture and have forsaken their Covenant with God. Are we to believe that this includes one million innocent children who perished in the Holocaust?

The author argues for the Divine Origin of the Torah and insists that God spoke to the entire people at Mount Sinai. He maintains as well, that Jews achieve ethical superiority by following the revealed precepts of Torah. "Jewry's incomparably high marriage and low divorce rates, uncommonly tight-knit family structure, peerless emphasis on and success at educational pursuits, wildly disproportional contributions to technical advancement, unprecedented achievements in charity and benevolence, extreme underpresentation in criminal activities, and indefatigable commitment to altruistic politics and social action place them among the leaders of the human march towards civilization."

The author's conclusions are, of course, controversial — and in the end, a matter of personal faith. All readers, however, will profit from pondering supremely important concepts that are presented in a manner both lucid and stimulating.

Jewish Life

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The nominees have been announced, the tuxedos are on order and the Oscars are all gleaming. So as Hollywood gears up for its annual extravaganza, I thought this would be a good time to look at the many resources for Jewish movies on the Internet.

Sure, you've seen Yentl, Fiddler and The Jazz Singer and you wonder how much else is out there. Much more. Did you know that Elizabeth Taylor played the daughter of a Jewish merchant in Ivanhoe (1952)? Or that Rosalind Russell played a Jewish war widow who falls in love with wealthy Japanese widower Alec Guinness in A Majority of One (1961)?

Those are just a couple of the hundreds of films with Jewish or Israeli themes that you can learn about on the World Wide Web.

Two excellent places to start are the University of Idaho's Films, Videos and TV Programs of Jewish Interest [http://www.uidaho.edu/~mschreck/j-film-a.html] and the Jewish Film Archive Online [http://members.aol.com/jewfilm/index.html].

Once you've found a movie that interests you, I recommend consulting TV Guide's Movie Database [http://www.tvguide.com/movies/database/] and the massive Internet MovieDatabase [http://us.imdb.com/search] for detailed movie credits and links to film reviews. You can even use the IMDB's advanced search engine to look for movies filmed in Israel or about Jewish subject matter.

If you prefer to see movies on the big screen, there are many excellent Jewish film festivals run throughout the world. And even if you can't attend one, you can still be a virtual visitor via the Jewish Highway. The Toronto Jewish Film Festival maintains its site at [http://websights.com/tjff/archives.html]; New York/Los Angeles [http://www.bway.net/israel/]; Boston [http://bjff.cyways.com/]; San Francisco [http://www.sfjff.org/]; South Bay (Silicon Valley) [http://www.best.com:80/~sbjfs/], London [http://www.music-festival.demon.co.uk/films.htm] and Jerusalem [http://www.jer.cine.org.il/html/festival.htm].

Israel, of course, has its own vibrant film industry. For a very good overview of filmmaking in Israel, visit the site created by the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs [http://www.israel.org/facts/culture/fcult8.html] and Ariel — The Israel Review of Arts and Letters [http://www.israel.org/mfa/ariel/cinema.html]. Israel also boasts several large film archives dedicated to preserving that country's motion picture heritage. Take a look at the Jerusalem Film Centre's Archives [http://www.jer.cine.org.il/html/archive.htm] and the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive at the Hebrew University [http://www2.huji.ac.il/www_jcj/jfa.html].

OK, reading about the movies is fine but what about the stars. I don't have the space to write about all the Internet websites devoted to Jewish stars. But if you want to find out the latest news and rumors about Jews in Tinseltown and elsewhere, take a look at Kochavim: Famous Jews in the News [http://www.virtual.co.il/arts/kochavim/].

Speaking of Jews and Hollywood, Marlon Brando shocked the public with his comments last April on Larry King Live. Brando said that "Hollywood is run by Jews; it is owned by Jews — and they should have a greater sensitivity about the issue of people who are suffering." Writer Ben Stein responded to Brando in his article Do Jews Run Hollywood? [http://e1.eonline.com/Hot/Specials/Jews/index.html]. Stein's answer: "You bet they do — and what of it?" (For the record, Brando did apologize for his remarks. [http://pele.nando.net/newsroom/ntn/enter/041096/].)

If you are still looking for more movie-related sites, try the Jewish/Israel Culture-Link Launcher Film Links [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/culture.html#film] and Maven's Jewish/Israel Index [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/maven/subjects/idx199.htm].

Friendship
For Abe and Eva Sloma
Like warm rays that embrace trees and plants on earth's surface and gird them with vitality that they may rise and not falter, so is the warmth of true friends,
whose good will shines brightly and lifts you from your narrow shell into higher spheres of love and life.
And sure you are that they will succour you
in your hour of need and trial.

MEMORIAL CHAPEL

TORONTO'S JEWISH COMMUNITY CHAPEL
Over 69 years of Traditional Service

A MANY-SIDED APPROACH TO MEETING YOUR NEEDS

We live in an age when the Jewish community finds confidence and support in having a choice. We recognize that you as individuals appreciate seeing alternatives in matters which deal with the heart and family ties.

Because of that keen awareness for your needs, Steeles Memorial Chapel wants you to know that we always endeavour to provide you with helpful options in your funeral arrangements.

We are able to deal with your needs in ways that provide the fullest service, handling every detail that arises. Or we can show you some very affordable arrangements which are more modest, in keeping with your requirements and preferences.

Our many years of service to our community has shown us that empathy and flexibility in setting out the most appropriate arrangements for your needs are key elements in our widely based service. We are near, guiding you through the complexities, giving you workable options and making life a little easier, a little more comforting.

Seniors go online at Wagman Centre Computer Club

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Thanks to Henry Campbell, president of Toronto-based Perceptix Inc., a group of seniors at the Wagman Centre has been introduced to the world of e-mail and the Internet.

Campbell realized that if seniors had the ability to use electronic mail, they could communicate with their children, grandchildren, other family members and friends, and could join interest groups anywhere in the world.

The David and Vivian Campbell Family Foundation donated six computers to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. The Wagman Centre Computer Club was formed when Henry Campbell volunteered to present a series of hands-on classes.

"It was hard for the seniors in the computer group to believe that they could send a message anywhere in the world instantaneously and receive a reply within minutes at a minimal cost," he said.

At a recent class, 12 seniors in the computer club listened intently as he explained the process.

Club member Ida Kestenberg then sent a message to her granddaughter Ryann Miller, a student at the University of Victoria.

She received a reply, which began with, "Dear Bubbie, Wow! I can't believe I got an e-mail from you! That was very surprising, I have to say."

And Evelyn Quitt, who sent e-mail to her grandson Mark Miller in Vancouver, received a reply prefaced with, "Good morning and what a surprise! Hello backatcha."

Campbell was born and raised in Montreal. After receiving a bachelor of commerce at Acadia University in Nova Scotia, he worked in the family business in Montreal and later in Toronto until it was sold in 1986.

He then established Perceptix Inc., which provides interactive learning materials, computer software applications, videodisks and CD-ROMs to provincial departments of education and school boards, as well as libraries and universities. It also provides training and support to customers.

He said the seniors at Baycrest will have a personal identity code and access to computers 24 hours a day, and they will not have to be at the computer or have it on in order to retrieve their messages.

"With a phone call, you have to consider the different time zones and you have to be at home to receive the call. With e-mail, there is no urgency to speak as you do with a clock-ticking long distance call. And you can take your time composing your messages."

He says he got the idea when he watched his children having a great time communicating on the computer and thought, "Why not seniors? It would be wonderful to help them expand their links with others through the computer."

Ida Kestenberg gets instruction on e-mail from Henry Campbell at the Wagman Centre's Computer Club.

Romance revisited

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Torah emphasizes the importance of male-female relationships and recognizes that the emotional issues which ensue are unavoidable, says Elliott Malamet, a local Jewish educator and writer.

He spoke recently at the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre (RJCC) on love and relationships in Judaism. The lecture was part of a havdalah program jointly sponsored by the RJCC and the Davisville Chaverim.

"One can't hide behind religion when it comes to emotional issues," Malamet told the group, describing Judaism as "relationship affirming."

He stressed that a person finds fulfilment and growth by being in a relationship with another, pointing out that as early as Genesis, chapter II, the Torah says it is not good for human beings to be alone.

At the end of the chapter, the Torah instructs men and women to leave their parents and lead independent lives, he added.

"Judaism's attitude to marriage is broad-based," Malamet said. "It's not simply a matter of having children. Spiritual, emotional and physical intensity is very important."

He noted that while many people have difficulty associating Judaism with the "spontaneous combustion" of romantic love, the Torah in fact offers different models of relationships.

Social worker confronts life's 'terible secrets'

'Important to provide women with forum to dialogue'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Gail Solish knows firsthand that the Jewish community is not immune to any of life's "terrible secrets."

As a social worker for Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), Solish is based at the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, a children's mental health centre that provides a day treatment program to youth ages 11 to 17 who have a wide range of emotional or behavioral problems.

Gail Solish

Services include an education program accredited by the Toronto Board of Education, therapeutic group activities and individual, family and group treatment.

As the co-leader with Karen Wynnychuk, of an incest survivor's group, Solish says that incest is "kept so private that most people never have the opportunity to encounter others with the same secret. People need to realize that the Jewish community has the same problems as the community at large. The problems are just difficult to talk about."

Originally from Michigan, and a graduate of Michigan State University and Rudgers University in New Jersey, she has worked at JF&CS for 23 years. She started the group about five years ago after working with incest survivors on an individual basis for several years.

"It is important in terms of healing to provide women with a safe forum in which to dialogue and connect.

"They do however, have to be emotionally prepared for the group and to ensure that they are ready, we invite them in for an assessment. It is a therapy group and we try and determine if it is a good vehicle for our client. If chosen, everyone has the opportunity to talk. Sometimes women choose to talk a lot less than others but listening can also be very helpful – sometimes as helpful as talking. When a woman discovers that her problems are not unique, she begins to feel better."

There are two separate sessions a year, with groups meeting weekly. "We try and discreetly advertise by sending out notices to doctors offices and sometimes people hear about us through others. For now, the group is just for women, but if we had a core group of about seven or eight men, we would definitely consider a group for them."

"People are amazing," says Solish. "It is extraordinary what incest survivors have experienced. To see them change for the better and have hope for the future gives me a lot of pleasure."

Romance in the Torah

of a powerful romantic attraction, Malamet suggested the two were drawn to each other on their first encounter, which is described in Genesis.

He said Isaac and Rebecca were two very different people, who "did not see eye to eye" on the rearing of their children, but they didn't have an opportunity to explore their differences prior to marriage.

According to Malamet, their relationship provides a model for modern couples who need to be clear-sighted about one another and their vision of marriage.

Another relationship model discussed was that of Jacob and Rachel. Malamet said Jacob, a man on the run, was drawn to Rachel (in Genesis, chapter 29) because he was alone and she gave him a sense of belonging: She was his first cousin, the daughter of his mother's brother, and so he felt a natural emotional bond with her.

Malamet contrasted Jacob's relationship with Rachel to that of his parents, Isaac and Rebecca, pointing out that the circumstances of father and son were very different: Jacob was a stranger without means, while Isaac, passive by nature, married a woman who was brought to him by his father's servant.

The Torah acknowledges that differences in people's experiences and circumstances affect how they relate to one another, Malamet said. "You can't avoid the inescapable issues of emotional baggage that people bring into a relationship. The Torah is aware of this and presents different [relationship] models to learn from."

A profound confrontation with the life of a book

Guest Voices

By HOWARD ASTER

A publisher sits between the writers, the creators of literature, knowledge, learning, and the readers, those who wish to know, to learn. In that sense, publishers are links in a chain of learning, reading, knowledge.

Imagine a world where the creators were unable to connect with the readers. It would be a world of immense silence, a world of incomplete thoughts, a lonely world, both for those who create and those who want or need to know, learn, read, reflect.

In this day and age, when entertainment has overpowered learning and information passes itself off as knowledge, the act of publishing is becoming increasingly trivialized; ethics, responsibility, commitment are no longer the primary concerns. But to touch, to influence, to change, to enlighten, to provoke feeling, these should be the real objectives of the act of publishing.

In tracking down stories worthy of publishing, I would like to relate a recent experience.

I was in Lviv in western Ukraine with my 12-year-old son, who was to have his bar mitzvah later that year. It was June 1991.

I wanted to go to western Ukraine to visit a village named Koretz in Volynin. Koretz is very important for me because that is where my late father was born in 1910. In the Jewish cemetery of Koretz my grandfather is buried. I needed to see this place.

My son and I visited a shul in Lviv, the one that in 1991 was still open and was being restored. Lviv, or Lemberg, the great centre of Jewish life of southeastern Poland until the turmoils of the 20th century — World War I, the Russian Revolution, World War II, the Cold War — changed borders and cultures, transformed Jewish life in that part of the world.

We visited the small structures adjacent to the shul. The gabbai proudly showed us the newly installed ovens that are now used to make matzot for the remaining 5,000 Jews of Lviv. The place was dark, wet, although some few Jews are trying desperately to bring it back to life. It was the end of the period of oppressive Soviet rule in Ukraine, a time of hope for religious freedom.

Then my son wandered off and I saw him struggling with something under some decaying wooden boxes in the corner. I rushed over to him, the gabbai following. We lifted a few boxes of rubble.

My son found some survivors — two survivors. Two books, large books, with leather covers, one published in 1837, the other published in 1858. He pulled them out. They were soaking wet. He gave them to the gabbai, who told him: "No, you found them, you take them. There are very few survivors left in this part of the world, in Lviv. I want you to take them with you. You will find a better home for them."

The life of this leather-bound Mishneh Torah, printed in the 18th century, contains endless stories of families, faith, life, death and devastation, making it a true 'survivor.'

This was my son's most profound confrontation with the life of a book, the life of learning. He now lives with two Holocaust survivors

There are endless numbers of stories that reside in these two books, the stories of families, of people, of hands, of eyes, of faith, of life and hope, of death and devastation.

There are many, many, many other books around the world with names, stories, histories.

And that is why I want to be involved in the act of publishing books. In books, especially for Jews, everybody gets connected — the writers, the inspiration, the readers, the ideas, the survivors.

France honors sculptor Sorel Etrog

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Internationally acclaimed Canadian sculptor Sorel Etrog, 63, was recently inducted as Chevalier des Arts et Lettres by the French government at L'Alliance Française de Toronto at the opening of an exhibition, A Tribute to France, which included his figurative works of the 1960s.

In 1994, to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Normandy, the Canadian government donated Etrog's sculpture, Sun Bird II, to the village of Reviers, near the Canadian military cemetery.

His work is exhibited worldwide and is in the collections of many galleries and museums of modern art. He represented Canada in the Biennale of Venice in 1966 and was commissioned to represent Canada at the Olympic Games in Seoul in 1988.

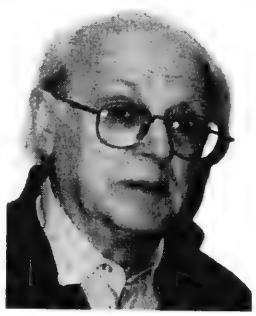
In Toronto, his sculptures can be seen at the Sun Life Centre and in front of Hart House at the University of Toronto. He designed the bronze statue for the Canadian film awards in 1968 – today called the Genie. Etrog received the Order of Canada in 1995.

He is presently working on a new series of works to be exhibited next year.

Etrog told The CJN that his works are a reflection of his past, combined with his hopes for the future.

Several months ago, he was invited to return as a guest to his country of birth, Romania. After being away for 46 years, he said, the trip brought back memories of the war years, of the terror and persecution of his childhood — of living under the Nazis followed by the equally oppressive Stalinist regime.

The Etrogs immigrated to Israel in 1950. He served in the Israeli army for three years and received an art scholarship. He studied at the Institute of Painting and Sculpture in Tel Aviv with teachers such as Marcel Janco, one of the founders of the Dada movement.



Sorel Etrog

Etrog's works were first exhibited in 1956 and his first one-man show in 1958 won him a scholarship to the Brooklyn Museum of Art School.

Shortly after Etrog arrived in New York, collector, Samuel J. Zacks of Toronto, purchased his piece titled White Scaffolding for $200 and invited Etrog to bring some of his work to Toronto. After arriving in Toronto, Etrog went to Southampton on Lake Huron for the summer to work at a plywood factory owned by Zacks.

With access to wood and power tools at Southampton, Etrog continued his painted wood construction and began his wooden sculptures.

עונת האוסקר בעיצומה, ואיתה מוציאים האולפנים למסכים את מה שהם מקווים שיביא לחם את התהילה. אז הינה, מבחר של סרטים שלפי השמועה יזכו להיות מועמדים לאוסקר בקטגוריות שונות.
למרות שמו,
The English Patient חוא דווקא סרט הוליבודי ענק ממדים. זהו סיפורו של טייס אנגלי שנכווה קשות בהתרסקות מטוסו באפריקה. זהו גם סיפור משולש אחבה בזמן מלחמה. הסיפור בהחלט מרתק והצילומים יפים, אבל מה - הכל קצת סתמי, לא משאיר שום טעם של עוד, או מחשבה עמוקה , או אפילו סתם מחשבה. קצת אופרת סבון בצבעים יפים. שש בסולם קורן.
The People vs. Larry Flint הוא סיפורו האמיתי של לארי פלינט, פושתאק אמריקאי שהקים מועדון חשפנות ובעקבותיו את עיתון הפורנוגרפיה Husler . במרכז הסרט- מאבקו המשפטי של פלינט על זכותו להדפיס כל זבל אפשרי בחסות חוק חופש הדיבור האמריקני המפורסם. לא, חס ושלום, זכות הדיבור של המדוכאים, המיעוטים, החולים, אלא זכות הדיבור של חזיר עשיר ונהנתן ללכלך את מי ומה שהוא רוצה. כמובן שהדבר אפשרי רק משום שיש לו כסף לעורכי דין ולמשפטים. הסרט עשוי מצוין והוא בהחלט מעניין, אלא שהנושא מטומטם ומחליא כפי שרק אמריקה יכולה. זה נורא יפה שהחוק האמריקני מגן גם על חֻלאות עשירים כמו לארי פלינט, אבל במדינה שבה לארבעים מליון איש אין ביטוח בריאות ושסיכוייו של כושי בהארלם לחגיע לגיל שלושים קטנים מאשר בבנגלדש- וזֹאת לא מעניין אותי לארי פלינט. שבע בסולם קורן,

כפי שהבטחתי, להלן התגובות הראשונות לנושא זכות ההצבעה לישראלים בחו"ל. כדי לאפשר כמה שיותר תגובות-קוצרו המכתבים תוך שמירת הרעיונות העיקריים.
"גידי קורן שלום !
שמים לפני ישראלי שמבקר ונכנס לישראל התחייבויות בקשר לכניסה ויציאה כמו מס נסיעות, אישור יציאה מהצבא, פספורט, אישור על ביטול אזרחות, רישום ילדים ועוד ועוד. אבל לא נותנים את הזכויות של אזרחות. אם לא נותנים את הזכות הפרלמנטרית לבחור אז בבקשה לבטל את החובות. אני עדיין מתגעגע מאוד לישראל וחולם לפעמים על הזמנים הטובים. אני רוצה להצביע בבחירות בישראל ורוצה להרגיש שייך. הקורא הנאמן ליכטנטל ירחמאל."
"לגידי קורן שלום !

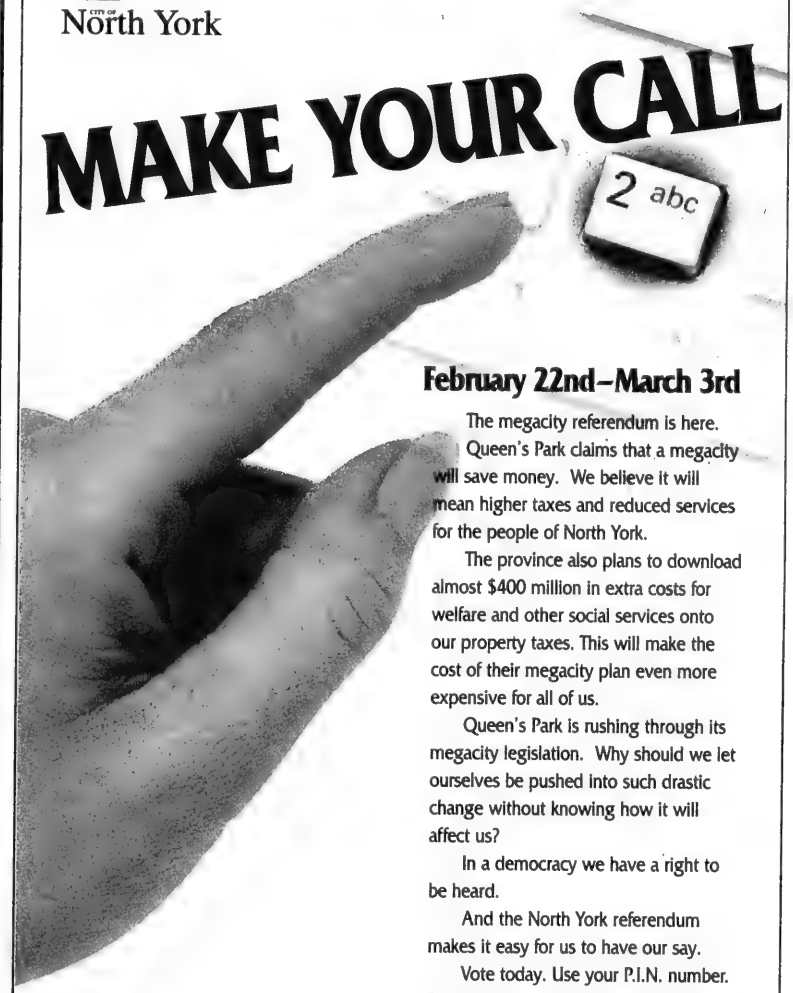
City of North York

MAKE YOUR CALL



February 22nd–March 3rd

The megacity referendum is here.

Queen's Park claims that a megacity will save money. We believe it will mean higher taxes and reduced services for the people of North York.

The province also plans to download almost $400 million in extra costs for welfare and other social services onto our property taxes. This will make the cost of their megacity plan even more expensive for all of us.

Queen's Park is rushing through its megacity legislation. Why should we let ourselves be pushed into such drastic change without knowing how it will affect us?

In a democracy we have a right to be heard.

And the North York referendum makes it easy for us to have our say.

Vote today. Use your P.I.N. number. Put your finger on the button and make them hear your voice.

It's your call.

If you're eligible to vote but haven't received your P.I.N. number call the City of North York Referendum Help Line 395-0411.
(Our lines are open 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. throughout the voting period)

Child poverty is a moral, political issue for Canada

By GORDON WOLFE
Special to The CJN

"This house...seeks to achieve the goal of eliminating child poverty by the year 2000."

Feature Report

Unanimously passed resolution of the Canadian House of Commons, Nov. 24, 1989.

One frustrating feature of poverty in a country such as Canada is its invisibility. Ours is not the poverty of the swollen belly or dehydration, It is, rather, the type that makes a thousand subtle subtractions from the bodies and minds of people in its grip, draining them of health, hope and opportunity. Canada's poor children are the kids who go to school without breakfast and to bed without supper and get box lunches from food banks.

Social scientists define poor children as those living in families whose incomes fall below Statistics Canada's low income cutoff line, which was $26,232 for an urban family of three in 1995.

Since 1989, the number of Canadian children living in poverty has increased by 46 percent to 1.3 million. Today, in Metropolitan Toronto a staggering one in three children rely on welfare. Though children 19 years of age and under make up 22 percent of Metro's population, they make up 43 percent of Metro's food bank users. Eighty percent of children served by the three children's aid societies in Metropolitan Toronto live on incomes at or below the poverty line. Metro Toronto, with only 45 percent of the GTA's children, had almost 70 percent of the GTA's poor children. Families are increasingly being forced to choose between homelessness and hunger. Monthly food bank use by children in Metro has grown by 64 percent in the past year alone.

In Greater Toronto, 13 percent of Jews live below or near the poverty line. In Montreal, the figure is 20 percent. One in 10 Jewish children under the age of 14 lives in poverty. Persons in single parent families are two to three times more likely to be poor than are persons who lived in husband/wife families. Persons who immigrated to Canada in the past 10 years and now live in Toronto account for approximately 10 percent of the Jewish community; however, they constitute 18 percent of the Jewish poor. Poverty affects almost one in six Jews in Toronto, yet continues to be underrecognized by many Jews in our community.

Impact of Poverty on Children

The impact of poverty on children is dramatic. Children from poor families are at greater risk educationally, and the chance that they will drop out of school is almost twice as high as that of children from non-poor families.

Poverty also undermines families and the well-being of children in other ways. These children are often hungry or inadequately nourished. Many live in over-crowded housing. Poverty also would appear to be intertwined with inadequate parenting skills and inconsistent parental behavior. Poor parents — those working and raising children alone with few supports — become overwhelmed, further lessening the odds of their children developing normally.

Child psychiatrist Dr. Paul Stenhauer recently wrote: "We believe that it costs significantly less, and achieves more, to invest in supporting child development early than it does to pay later for increased health services, remedial education services, police and court services, for custody of young offenders, for foster care or for the cost of supporting — sometimes for their whole lives — adults who fail to become self-reliant and productive members of society."

In a recent speech to a conference on Canada's children, Dr. John Evans, chair of the board, Torstar Corporation, quoted study after study which substantiated the belief that the social environment in which children develop is a key determinant of their quality of life, potential to learn, health, well-being and competence.

"Taken together the results of studies elsewhere and here in Canada provide a coherent and convincing story to explain the importance of social determinants of health and their profound influence on child development," Evans said.

The End of Social Democracy

Political scientist Ralf Dahrendorf believes that social democracy is ending as a major influence in the world. Dahrendorf made this statement in Jerusalem at a conference honoring a leading interpreter of social democracy, Prof. Shlomo Avineri.

Social democracy is a body of ideas that aims to assure everyone a share in the economic and social assets of a society and allows them to participate as fully as possible. In the past 50 years, social democratic ideas have been integrated into the platforms of almost every political party in the western world, but this is no longer the case, Dahrendorf said.

Nations now contend with three concerns, he said: competing in a globalized economy, maintaining social solidarity and assuring political and civil liberties. According to Dahrendorf, society seems able to work at no more than two of these three goals at once.

Britain and the United States, he said, have made their choices — to compete in the global market and to maintain civil liberties. Giving up on social solidarity, they have steadily diminished programs.

In Britain and the United States, the decline in social democracy has had its impact, he added. Earnings and wealth of the upper 10 percent have grown rapidly and incomes at the lower end have declined sharply. The disadvantaged have become more isolated and many exist on the fringes, with little stake in their societies.

Dahrendorf said countries that abandon universal values are now facing serious law and order problems ranging from street crime to guerrilla warfare. He warned that as the state fails to provide safety and security, the majority seek more protection from minorities.

Canada has been somewhere in the middle. It has always held stronger social democratic values than the United States but weaker than those in Europe. Its position has produced some interesting results on the international stage, as demonstrated by a recent report in Fortune magazine. The magazine's latest survey of business executives concluded that Toronto is the best place in the world to live and do business. Their reasons included education, culture, health services and public safety, all based on the social democratic values of Canadian society.

Canadians are being told that social programs are an obstacle to success in the global economy. In response, we are reducing communal responsibility in every area — social assistance, education, health, culture and public service.

The challenge we face in Canada is how to participate in the global economy without sacrificing the social solidarity that makes our society attractive.

Help for Poor Children

Now Ottawa is proposing to do something about child poverty, although the target date of July 1998 sounds a long way off. Election goody or not, the child benefit is a fine idea, although the funding falls well short of the $2 billion that was needed if Canada hopes to win the war on poverty by the year 2000. As well, some caution needs to be introduced. The initiative announced by the finance minister should not be fragmented and separated from the fact that poor children are poor because they live in poor families and families are poor because, in many cases, the parents can't find employment. Furthermore, those who can't earn income have had their social support systems drastically reduced. Every job lost to some downsizing or funding cut in the name of reducing the deficit impacts on children in families.

Five provinces with 816,000 of Canada's 1.5 million poor children — British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Quebec and New Brunswick — have introduced or plan to introduce innovative child benefits. Unfortunately, Ontario, with one-third of the nation's low income children, has been silent on its plans for child benefit reform. The silence is ominous, since progress toward a truly national benefit will be difficult without Ontario's participation.

As recently stated by Ken Battle, president of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy: "It would be tragic if the national child benefit were derailed by other issues. Now Ontario should dust off the blueprint for the child income program, redesign it to fit its current fiscal reform agenda and join its fellow provinces in building a national system. Forgoing part of the Ontario income tax cut to finance an integrated child benefit for the province's 500,000 poor children would be money well invested."

In the publication, Unequal Futures, by the Child Poverty Action Group, we are told that "child poverty in the midst of affluence in this country is a national shame. Poverty is a crime against the human spirit; it denies poor children the chance to develop their knowledge, skills and talents and limits their capacities to contribute to the community. It also breeds a certain intolerance and fear of poor children among the better off, with the consequence that poor kids may receive biased treatment from schools, health and social service agencies, the police and the courts. The vulnerability of children and their helplessness to affect change on their own behalf makes child poverty a moral and political issue in this country."

"Our children are our future" goes the trite saying. But what kind of future are we planning when we subject our children to poverty, poor health care, lack of educational opportunities? If we are serious that "our children are our future," we need to put into place, right now, the guarantees that accept that children are a communal as well as an individual responsibility.

The late Rabbi Leo Baeck reminded us that "Judaism must not stand aside when the great problems of humanity which are reborn in every epoch battle in the societies of mankind to find their way. We must not as Jews deny the problems of our time, nor hide ourselves as Jews in the face of them. We are Jews for the sake of humanity. We have our questions to raise and we have to give our answers. To rouse the conscience of humanity is our best titled deed. We will have to speak often a no to much that happens on earth; to speak a no for the sake of our great yes, of our great demand. We shall often have to accuse, for the sake of justice, of love, for the sake of the promise, to say no and accuse, because we are what we are and should be, the Lord's most loyal opposition on earth, the steadfast and the stubborn for God's sake."

THE Baycrest Campaign
Imagine Our Future Without It

To each and every member of our community:

For as long as I can remember, Baycrest has been here to serve our community by taking care of our elderly. In doing so, it has become a leader of research into aging, and has created systems of care that are recognized world-wide as adding quality to life.

To continue in this fashion, we have to be here for Baycrest. Every single one of us. The current Campaign has generated a good response. Now, we are in the final stretch, and we need support from every member of our community to reach our $60 million goal.

Sooner or later, one way or another, every Jewish family will be touched by Baycrest. Right now, Baycrest needs you. As Chair of the "Over the Top" Committee, I am asking you to write a cheque so Baycrest can continue caring for our Jewish elderly. We need you, and your support, because it's your Baycrest.

Sincerely,

Edwin Goldstein

P.S. For over 30 years, I have made Baycrest my personal commitment to the community. Today, I am prouder than ever of the work Baycrest does and the professionals and staff who make it all happen. This is the time to share your pride and commitment. Baycrest is calling on you.

York pulls plug on Islamic group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University has cancelled an Islamic student association's access to a computer mailing service after the group used the computer system to distribute Holocaust denial material.

"The material [the group] was promoting was insulting and offensive to the York community," said Sine MacKinnon, a spokesperson for the university. York shut down the group's access to the computers within a few days of being notified of its misuse, she added.

MacKinnon said undergraduate groups generally don't get access to the university's "listserve," its electronic computer mailing service. Graduate students can get access to the service if it's a prerequisite for academic pursuits but that certainly wasn't the case here, she said.

The university acted quickly after being notified of the material by Canadian Jewish Congress. In a Feb. 18 letter to York University President Susan Mann, Congress pointed out a student group using the name Al-Akhbar was using the listserve to distribute material written by Arthur Butz, an electrical engineer from Northwestern University who calls the Holocaust "a legend."

A publicly funded university should not be used to distribute that sort of material, said Bernie Farber, Congress' national director of community relations. Congress was informed of the computer mailing by Rabbi Reuben Poupko and immediately made its concerns known to the university, he said.

Butz is author of The Hoax of the 20th Century, which is published by Noontide Press, an offshoot of the Institute for Historical Review, an anti-Semitic organization that couches its racism under a veneer of academia.

The item distributed by Al-Akhbar, titled A Short Introduction to the Study of Holocaust Revisionism, refers to the Holocaust as an "extermination legend," claims Zyklon insecticide (used in gas chambers) was only used for delousing and that the Final Solution referred only to the deportation of Jews to the east.

In the computer listserve, Al-Akhbar is described as "sponsored by the Islamic Association for Palestine (IAP)." The group's website (http://www.iap.org/) stated the IAP was "founded in 1981 [as] a non-profit organization dedicated to working towards a fair, just and comprehensive solution for the problem of Palestine." Its information office is given as a post office box in Dallas, Texas.

The IAP's website published numerous items attacking Israel. One section of the IAP homepage contained an abstract from a recent book by Bassam Jarrar, "one of the most popular Palestinian Islamic thinkers." The book claims the Quran predicts the destruction of the State of Israel in the year 2022. "The result of this research conceal [sic] with Jewish revelations which predict the destruction of Israel in the year 2022," the abstract claims.

Another section of the homepage, titled Al-Akhbar: Press Cuttings, claims "the Arab press has launched a strident campaign against the new [U.S.] Secretary of State, Madeleine Albright, as a frustrated Jewish old maid who was promised a husband by President Clinton if she succeeds in toppling Boutros Ghali as secretary-general of the United Nations." The British newspaper the Guardian is quoted as a source for that statement.

France honors Etrog

He was invited to exhibit his work at the Walter Moos Gallery in Toronto and many of his wood pieces were acquired by collectors including, Ayala and Sam Zacks, the John Eaton family, Walter Carsen and the Dunkelman family.

When he returned to Manhattan, Etrog cast his first 10 small sculptures in brass, which were purchased by the Dominion Gallery in Montreal.

In 1961, he had his first bronze exhibition at Walter Moos Gallery and in 1963, he had an exhibition at the Rose Fried Gallery, where the Museum of Modern Art, the Guggenheim Museum, Nelson Rockefeller and other collectors purchased his work.

That year, he returned to Toronto when collectors Ben and Yael Dunkelman offered him a studio in their building.

He later travelled extensively to museums and galleries in Europe and set up a second studio in Florence.

Etrog has been uprooted many times in his life. His style has changed from painted wood constructions to paintings, drawings, woodcuts, graphics and sculptures.

He says, "I have been privileged to have met and collaborated with many important writers who became my lifelong friends, such as Samuel Beckett, Marshal McLuhan, and Eugene Ionesco. They have enriched my life."

Israeli universities form consortium to attract students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last year Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (CFTAU) sponsored an information session at York University for students interested in studying in Israel. Seven students showed up.

This year TAU went back to the same campus together with representatives of six other Israeli universities to put on an information fair, and 75 students attended.

Canadian representatives of the seven Israeli universities – TAU, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Haifa University, Bar-Ilan University, Ben-Gurion University (BGU), Weizmann Institute of Science and the Technion – have formed a consortium called Study Israel, which was awarded a $15,000 UJA Federation continuity grant.

The money is underwriting a four-phase program, of which the information fair, also held at the University of Toronto (U of T), was a part.

The project was spearheaded by Mark Rubinstein, director of the Canadian Overseas Student Program at CFTAU and Michael Litvack, academic affairs coordinator of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who came up with the idea about a year and a half ago. None of the other universities in the consortium has a staff person in Canada to deal only with academic affairs.

A similar consortium was also established recently in the United States, said Samantha Feiner, admissions adviser of the New York-based BGU Centre for International Student Programs.

Feiner, who attended the information fairs here, praised the consortium system. "Travelling together brings in a bigger crowd. We all have the same main goal: to get students to go to Israel."

"It's easier to convince students to go study in Israel, and let them pick the university that best suits their needs," said Litvack. "It's a win-win situation."

Phase I of the project consisted of placing a series of ads in washrooms at York and U of T, where students were bound to see them. The catchy messages stressed that studying abroad provides an advantage in today's job market.

Phase II, now drawing to a close, focused on the information fairs, which included talks by alumni and local campus administrators on issues like how to access scholarships. Students also filled out ballots for a free ticket to Israel; the winner is to be announced imminently.

At a time when resources are stretched, it's only logical to work together, Rubinstein explained. "It doesn't make sense to each take out a small ad when we could take one together for more impact."

Consortium members had to "put aside the issues of whose turf you're dealing with," he said. "There are no logos on the ads, no [Canadian Friends] phone numbers. These are things that organizations don't generally give up."

To make things easier for students, the ads list only one phone number, 1-800-567-ISRA(EL), a toll-free line already established for information about Israel Experience programs.

Upcoming phases of the project include more traditional marketing and outreach to unaffiliated students, as well as the implementation of a follow-up program that will provide opportunities for alumni to become involved in the Jewish community here.

Current follow-up programs "are great in terms of continuing the feeling" but don't necessarily involve alumni in the community, said Rubinstein.

The program thus far has been "very successful," said Litvack. "We have the community to thank. [for the grant]. The Study Israel fairs are really models for the future for our recruitment."

GUELPH STUDENTS FOCUS ON GLOBAL JUDAISM

Past presidents of the University of Guelph Jewish Students Organization (JSO) were among those who gathered for the recent annual Guelph Shabbaton, which focused on "Global Judaism." From left were Sara Fisher, Saul Cohen, Jenn Kassie (current JSO president), Matt Stein, Sasha Shekhtman, Cindi Cohen, Leanne Rosen and Michael Sobol, University of Guelph psychology professor and co-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region's community services committee. Lakeview Homes' Cordoba Estates

Since 1979, Lakeview Homes has built 6,500 homes in the Toronto region. Developer Rob Montemarano describes Cordoba Estates, Lakeview's seventh develop-ment in the Bathurst-Steeles area, as a "private enclave with a European theme."

Cordoba's 1st phase is 38 single-family stucco homes, available this March; 70% are already sold. Prices start at $329,000 for a 2,300 sq. ft. home; 3 and 4 bedroom plans are still available.

"Other builder's upgrades," says Montemarano, "are standard features here." Interior features include 9' main-floor ceilings, strip wood living and dining room floors, coffered dining-room ceiling, decorative columns and wood casement windows. Front yards are landscaped; and each backyard has a deck and decorative fence.

"These are custom homes," Montemarano emphasizes. "No two are identical. The quality and craftsmanship reflects the 5,000 sq. ft. custom homes we build in Toronto and Richmond Hill under Barmont and Worth Homes." There is a 2 hr. designer consultation to help you choose interior colours and customize floor plans, and a consultation for kitchen design. There are many elevations and exterior colours to choose from, and several landscape packages.

Cordoba Estates' 2nd phase is a luxury 8 storey, 40 unit condominium building, with sandy-toned marble and stucco, and double-glazed windows. The foyer of the building, finished in marble, has a fountain with lounge area.

The interiors have extra-high ceilings and columns, panelled doors, 4 1/8" pine baseboards, ceramics in main hall, kitchen and bathroom, cornice molding in den and living room, and an outdoor balcony — as well as 5 appliances, oval tub ensuite, and individually controlled heating and air conditioning. Most suites also have a gas fireplace.

There is a choice of ceramics or marble in the entry; designer kitchen cabinetry is available; and there is a selection of lighting packages, as well as a choice of natural-finish wood flooring or upgrade broadloom. A designer also assists you in choosing interior colours, finishings and floor plans which suit your style. "Each condo," explains Montemarano, "is also treated as a custom home."

Amenities include kitchen and bar for private gatherings, guest suite, banquet room, fitness centre, games room, spa with men's and ladies' change rooms, and indoor pool with whirlpool overlooking a panoramic garden. There is underground parking, plenty of storage room, and 24 hr. security with card entry.

Condo sizes range from 990—1,811 sq. ft.; prices start at $189,900. There are also 2 penthouses of 2,723 and 11,800 sq. ft. Occupancy is slated for fall 1998. "Previews have already begun," Montemarano points out.

For a private preview, call soon: (905) 738-6033. Or drop in on the sales centre, on the west side of Bathurst just north of Steeles, opposite Townsgate Drive.

Eclectic composition: tips on mixing styles

If you have ever had the task of combining furnishings from two different households, you know the difficulties this presents. Mixing the various elements from two different styles of decor can be difficult. Here are a few tips to help you get started.

First take an inventory of all the pieces. Include not only the large items such as furniture, but also include such items as area rugs, lamps, pictures, and even accessories that you may incorporate into the decorating scheme. Once you have your list, go through it and check off the items you definitely want to keep. This may include antiques, high quality furnishings, and items of sentimental value. It even may include that comfortable old chair in which you just love to read.

But what if the items do not match? Take heart. The eclectic look is officially "in". Gone are the days when every single piece has to match. There is, however, a difference between not matching and not co-ordinating.

Now for that comfortable, worn out chair I mentioned ... Consider recovering or refinishing some of the pieces to fit a particular room or to match the colour scheme. Large pieces of furniture, such as armoires or cabinets may be converted to hold audio/visual equipment, or even extra linen or clothes.

Finishing touches can do wonders to unite a mixture of furnishings. Look for common elements in your pieces. Is there a colour or texture that catches your eye? Perhaps a pillow in a patterned fabric that picks up colour from a couple of the blended pieces will unify the area. Or change the frame or matting on a picture to give it a whole new look.

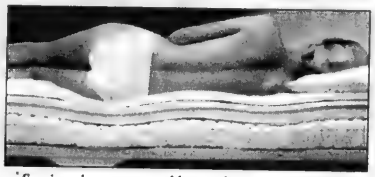
Hazelton Lanes merchants committed to excellence in home decor and accessories

SAMINA* sleep system offers relief for insomnia, back pain

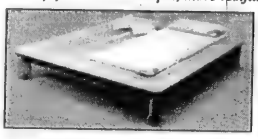
In a bold departure from traditional beds and bedding, the SAMINA sleep system was developed by a consortium of European back doctors whose modus operandi was to start from scratch and address the needs of the human body rather than "improve" on inadequate existing products. Now available in North America at Hazelton Lanes Shopping Centre, SAMINA* boasts several key innovations that will help you achieve deeper, more restful sleep:

1. Mattress and base construction. The traditional box spring has been replaced by a base consisting of a series of wooden slats separated by chemical-free latex foam. Constructed like your spine, this base flexes with your body, receiving the energy your body transmits as you sleep and returning it to you. This is covered by two separate mattresses — one consisting of firm latex foam, the other of 100% pure merino sheep's wool containing all the original lanolin. Totally absent are the arbitrary fluctuations of coil springs, as are the harmful electromagnetic fields they create: a SAMINA* sleep system is 100% metal-free, from the mattresses right down to the optional wooden frame, which ingeniously interlocks to create a beautiful piece of furniture.

2. Bedding composition. All SAMINA* bedding accessories, including duvets, blankets, and pillows, are filled with pure merino sheep's wool. This has several advantages over both down and synthetic pile: (a) it allows you to sleep dry by absorbing, through osmosis, the moisture emitted by your body as you sleep — unlike down and synthetic fibres, which repel this moisture so that you wind up sleeping in your own perspiration; (b) it is 100% hypoallergenic; (c) unlike other materials, it is 100% resistant to dust mites.



Samina sleep system addresses body's physiological needs to help you achieve deeper, more restful sleep



3. Bedding covers. All SAMINA* sheets, pillowcases, duvet covers and other accessories are made of pure, unbleached damask cotton and are hand-dyed with vegetable dyes.

Friendly to the environment and your body, the SAMINA* system will allow you not only to fall asleep more quickly, but also to enjoy a deeper, more restful sleep. "There's less reason for your body to toss and turn, says director of operations Ralph Haverkate, "because it doesn't need to fight to achieve a position of comfort. The SAMINA* system works in harmony with your body, unlike conventional beds which compete with it."

Sales of the SAMINA* system have been brisk, says Haverkate, because more and more Canadians are discovering that "it's worth investing in an activity [sleep] that occupies one-third of our lives and affects how we feel during the other two thirds."

SAMINA* (tel. 929-6213) is located in the upper concourse of Hazelton Lanes Shopping Centre.

Yorkville Design Centre has time for good work only

I don't have time for mediocrity," says Barbara Munn, partner in Yorkville Design Centre (tel. 922-5620), the award-winning interior design team headquartered in Hazelton Lanes' upper concourse.

With that simple affirmation, Ms. Munn makes an eloquent statement not only about her own personal ethos, but about the uncompromising approach of the firm she represents.

"Since time is really all we have," she elaborates — "by "we" I mean both myself and the client — it's far too important to waste on mediocrity. It takes as much time to do something badly as to do it well, and one good thing is worth a thousand mediocre things." In practical terms, she continues, this might mean devoting a limited budget to the impeccable treatment of a single room rather than attempting to stretch this budget over a whole house or office.

Yorkville Design Centre: making every detail count

For someone who places such a premium on time, Munn certainly gives of it generously, as do her associates. In a unique offer that has proven wildly popular, two of YDC's design professionals will visit your office or home and, for $250, offer the kind of consultation normally associated with five-to-six figure design projects.

During the session, you can feel free to ask any and every question — from where to hang your favourite pictures to which colour of wall paint to use — and have them expertly answered. Moreover, you'll receive some very specific advice on what route to take to achieve your interior design goals, with no strings attached and no pressure to carry the process one step further.

For those who do wish to proceed, however, these sessions help to establish rapport. Since interior design decisions often run into the many thousands of dollars, says Munn, it's essential for the client to feel comfortable with the firm they select. The interview allows customers to determine whether the necessary chemistry exists, and the insights gained in these few hours often enable them to save thousands of dollars by ruling out ill-conceived ideas and focusing on productive ones.

Munn is particularly proud of YDC's 17-year association with Downsview Kitchens, whose commitment to excellence mirrors her own. As noted by Toronto Life, YDC has "... a fine tradition of craftsmanship as well as style," and is "probably the finest kitchen department of any supplier [of Downsview Kitchens] in the city."

With an impeccable track record of successful projects spanning the entire North American continent, Yorkville Design Centre is refreshingly approachable, in every sense of the word. While the range of services offered is broad — from decorating a single bedroom to designing an entire house or office building — the firm's goal is highly specific: to do good work only, regardless of the size of project or the budget involved.

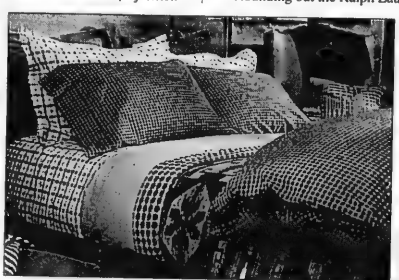
Ralph Lauren Home Collection is richly-textured melting pot

With the same flair that characterizes his clothing collections, Ralph Lauren has left his indelible signature on the landscape of interior design. Eschewing conventions right, left and centre, he merges apparently disparate elements, colours and patterns into an earthy, richly-textured whole that says "This is home." Like the melting pot that is America — and, by extension, Canada — the Lauren look transposes Old World elements to the West with style and panache. Exuding urban warmth, yet echoing the rural experience, a Lauren room draws you in, sits you down, and invites you to stay indefinitely.



American mosaic: this Ralph Lauren bedding treatment is a melting pot of diverse design elements

Enhancing the Ralph Lauren home experience is the warm, light-filled enclave it occupies in the Polo Shop (tel. 968-8686) in Hazelton Lanes' upper concourse. Eighteen-foot ceilings and massive picture windows afford a picturesque view of a Lauren bedroom setting, the focal point of the collection.

A striking line of bed linens replete with stripes, checks, solids, and prints, all luxuriously woven in the finest fabrics, invite you to mix, match, or create your own patchwork-quilt-of-a-look.

Enhancing the collection's appeal is the availability of a wide variety of Ralph Lauren original fabrics. From the shop's selection of swatches, you can order material for drapes, sofa covers, and many other items. The store will be happy to have them custom sewn to your specifications if you're not inclined to do the sewing yourself.

Also available are luxurious cotton towels, including a generously oversized bath sheet that has proven highly popular with customers.

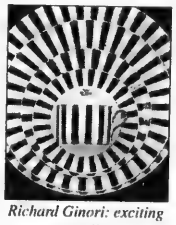
Rounding out the Ralph Lauren home collection are wallpaper, home fragrances, and a host of accessories including fine bone china, crystal, and flatware. Dignified but informal, each item builds comfort into your home.

Furniture (on display in the store, and available by special order) is also an important component of the Ralph Lauren look. Some snapshots: A luxurious writer's chair bound in distressed leather. Comfortable yet firm, it's to be lived in, not admired at a distance. Nearby, an equally comfortable everyday armchair, unexpectedly clad in denim.

Particularly prevalent throughout the collection, denim takes on a symbolic significance. In one broad, blue brush stroke, Lauren seamlessly bridges the gap between personal clothing and home clothing. Casual but never careless, both can be enjoyed in the welcoming space of the Ralph Lauren boutique at Hazelton Lanes.

Conway and Gower highlights Hazelton Lanes treasure hunt

A treasure chest brimming with riches, Conway and Gower (tel. 923-7003) is fairly bursting at the seams with fine furniture, china, Irish linens and antiques. You won't have to dive for this booty, however; a simple stroll through the west wing of Hazelton Lanes' upper concourse will suffice to unearth it.



Richard Ginori: exciting new patterns

For as little as $10 or as much as $12,000, Conway and Gower offers "everything for the dining room but the food."

Literally every item in the shop is hand-picked by proprietor Hilary Jones, and many are one of a kind, leading to an interesting dilemma: the item you fall in love with today may not be there tomorrow.

A boon to anyone seeking a unique gift, Conway and Gower not only offers many items unavailable elsewhere, but also provides free gift wrapping, storage and local delivery. Worldwide delivery can also be arranged, often with a considerable tax saving.

Fine furniture is a Conway and Gower mainstay

Specializing in Bridal Registry, Conway and Gower offers 10% off all pre-wedding registry purchases and gives the couple a gift both on their wedding day and on their first anniversary. Phone and mail orders are accepted to assist out-of-town guests.

"Helvellyn" by Cumbria Crystal

New in store are several exciting patterns from the ever-popular Richard Ginori line of fine china, and some wonderful additions to the unparalleled Cumbria collection of fine crystal. And Hilary promises marvellous new Irish linens for spring.

Because Conway and Gower's "merchandise" is an ever-changing mix of hundreds of different items, each visit offers the excitement of finding something new. With the only constants being fine quality and warm personal service, unearthing treasure at Conway and Gower can be an altogether elevating experience.

True luxury living comes to Bathurst and Lawrence

Have you ever thought how pleasant it would be, to enjoy the convenience and amenities of the condominium lifestyle, yet live in a neighbourhood with an established sense of community? If so, then Menkes Developments' Crystal Towers is the right place for you.

Crystal Towers will consist of 126 2 bedroom or 2 bedroom + den condos, ranging in price from $169,900—$323,900. Construction of the first tower began in summer 1996, and will finish in November this year.

About 60% of the condos have already found buyers. As they are brand-new, you will have an opportunity to customize if you purchase now, with the aim of moving in later this year.

Says Mark Cohen of Menkes Developments:

"We have a broad spectrum of residents, from younger first-time owners to couples who find the family home too big, now that their children have grown up and moved out.

"We're looking for people who want the relaxation of condo living, free from the burdens of outdoor upkeep and maintenance — along with the amenities they will find in a neighbourhood with well-established services, and families going back two or three generations."

Crystal Towers is a city centre address just north of Lawrence and Bathurst. It is within easy walking distance of schools, synagogues, a library and the newly renovated Lawrence Plaza, and has ready access to the "kosher shopping" strip along Bathurst from Wilson down to Eglinton. It is also close to the 401 and the Yonge and Spadina subway lines.

Many people in the community grew up and went to school in this neighbourhood. It has a blend of old and new generations, both in population and buildings, with many pleasant, well-tended family homes, plenty of mature trees, and an abundance of parks. Recently, many larger family homes have been built as well. What Crystal Towers brings to the area is a complement to what is already there.

Separate from the building itself is a mansion-like lobby, finished in traditional marble, wood and accent brass in an air of understated elegance. From this lobby, a 24 hr. concierge will direct all visitors, deliveries and tradespeople, and keep a watchful eye on security.

Crystal Towers is well furnished with amenities. Outdoors, there is a pool, a sun deck, and an extensive landscaped area for taking walks. Indoors, you will find an exercise room, whirlpool, "his and hers" saunas and change rooms, a multi-purpose party room, lounge, hobby room, and a suite for overnight guests.

At Crystal Towers, your security is important. There is perimeter fencing around the grounds. Every suite has fire and smoke detectors, and a personal intrusion alarm with a hot-line button for direct voice communication with the concierge; and there are video cameras in common areas, including the underground parking garage.

In addition, as a resident of Crystal Towers, you will receive a PAL personal alarm. This can be carried in a pocket or worn on a key chain, to signal the concierge in case of trouble.

Every suite has 2 bedrooms, 2 full baths, an eat-in kitchen and a balcony; some have 2 bedrooms + den. All sizes, ranging from 902— 1,646 sq. ft., are distinguished by generous use of space. In addition to the sizeable storage areas found in most suites, lockers can be purchased.

Finishings are of high quality. If you purchase now, there are many features you can choose from: cabinets, carpeting, wall and floor tiles, lighting and interior design. "Construction," explains Cohen, "is still at a stage where people have a choice."

People are excited about Crystal Towers. For a long time, many have waited for a development like this to come into the area; now it is here. Mel Lastman was present to welcome Crystal Towers when construction was inaugurated. "They're sold on it," Cohen smiles, "and it's selling well. It's happening; and it's what everyone wants."

The Crystal Towers sales office is located at 2 Covington Road, just north of Lawrence and east off Bathurst. Call now: ask for sales manager Freda Mullen or George Kerr at (416) 781-0222.

Alteriors offers personality for your home

To prosper, an owner-operated business must find or make its own special niche. That's why, as owner Wendie Cohen puts it, Alteriors "offers personality for your home" in the field of custom-crafted furnishings, functional accessories and design.

Alteriors offers a great variety of items, materials and styles from mainstream to modern, from flamboyant to decorous; Wendie enjoys new ideas, and encourages her artisans to innovate. Alteriors is for anyone who wants a home with a sophisticated-casual look — an artful blend of individuality, comfort and staying power, that you will enjoy for years.

Wendie's major inspiration is the mix of tradition and comfort in many European homes, whose furnishings and accessories have been collected by a family for generations, and go well together without actually matching. "This can be done with new pieces as well," she points out; "and an artful blend often looks better than a match. It has the warmth of something evolved and adapted to those who live with it — and it's easy to add new pieces."

Wendie sees a move away from gold colours to silver tones, in keeping with a trend to understated elegance. Pewter is in; natural wrought iron is replacing the black-painted kind. Alongside this, there is a transition from beige and neutral tones to brighter colours, as people are becoming a bit more venturesome with their decor.

Alteriors sells work by independent artisans and small custom companies — about 75% Canadian, though Wendie travels constantly searching out good work. About 60% of their trade is store sales; about 40% is custom, much of it from interior designers buying for clients.

You can buy what you see, or consult with Alteriors' resident designer who will help develop your idea and engage an artisan to craft it. Everything affecting your choice is considered, from budget, lifestyle and tastes to room size, shape, lighting, and the other furniture the new piece will be living with.

Alteriors is a team of three: Wendie, owner and manager, who also designs furniture; Julie Michels, expert in crafts and decorative accessories; and Diana Leveillé, qualified interior designer. Because they enjoy their work, you will enjoy Alteriors: at 527 Danforth Ave., two blocks west of Pape. Drop in, or call 466-3622.

Washable slipcovers perfect for mismatched styles

Everyone has a chair or sofa that isn't what it used to be. Remember the family heirloom that illustrates the family history in stains and scuffs. Or the sofa the kids watch TV and snack on and the dog curls up on as soon as he hears your car leave the driveway.

They all have good "bones" or sentimental value, but you'd like to sweep them into a dark corner when the guests arrive. Couch potatoes rejoice — that old fraying couch may not be headed for the end of the drive after all.

Slipcovers are practical cover-ups that can create a seasonal change, protect or give new life to an old piece of furniture and are affordable alternatives to re-upholstering or buying new.

Slipcovers have come a long way from the stretchy one-size fits all numbers you may remember seeing at grandma's house. The new generation of semi-fitted or custom tailored washable covers are quick decorator fixes and perfect for unifying mismatched styles.

Slipcovers present plenty of options and are not just for chairs and sofas. You can recover anything! Sofa beds, sectionals, ottomans, dining room chairs, wicker or wooden furniture, patio chairs etc. — the possibilities are endless.

Once you have slipcovered furniture you will never live with anything else!

Fight promised to keep Judaic studies program

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University religious studies chair Ira Robinson says he is going to fight to save the university's honors program in Judaic studies, one of 23 arts and sciences programs recommended to be axed.

Robinson, who is a Jewish studies professor, said the honors program should not be dropped because it would not save the university money and its academic quality is not in question.

The loss of the program would mean top students in Judaic studies would not have the option of taking the more intensive course of study recommended for those planning to go on to the graduate level, he said.

The issue, he underlined, is not loss of jobs.

The report before the Concordia administration also calls for the reduction of courses in more than 40 other mostly graduate and specialty arts and sciences programs, in order to cut $5 million from the university's budget over three years. The report was written by vice-rector (academic) Jack Lightstone, who was himself a religious studies professor.

The Education Ministry has told Concordia it must reduce its spending by $20 million, or 11 per cent.

The number of honors Judaic students is very small, said Robinson, maybe four or five of the current 38 undergraduates.

Undergraduates have the choice of taking a regular BA with a major in Judaic studies, or the honors programs, which is more demanding. Honors students earn more credits in their field, for example, taking three instead of two years of Hebrew, Robinson said. They are also required to write a thesis, which involves taking a six-credit honors seminar and working with a faculty adviser.

Robinson said he can make a strong case that the time the four religious studies professors spend with the honors students does not cost the university anything above the salaries they are paid for their regular teaching load. The honors seminar, for instance, is given as a tutorial "with no financial implications."

The Judaic studies program, which is about 25 years old, also has MA and PhD levels. This year, there are 10 or 11 master's and three doctoral students, Robinson said.

The number of undergraduates has increased somewhat in recent years, while the graduate section took a dip in the mid-'80s when McGill University launched its master's program in Jewish studies, he said.

Especially serious Judaic students might opt for McGill or another university if Concordia loses its honors program, he suggested.

Graduates tend to go on to careers as teachers in Jewish schools or study for the rabbinate. A few enter other graduate programs, such as social work, with a view to becoming community professionals.

A significant number of students take Judaic studies simply out of interest, including mature students often as old as their 70s or 80s, he said.

A chair in Canadian Jewish Studies is expected to be established in the next few months at Concordia, which will enable the university to hire another full-time professor in the program, Robinson noted.

A $250,000 multiculturalism grant from the former Conservative government provided the seed money for the chair in 1993. Since then the Concordia capital campaign has brought the total up to $750,000, Robinson said.

Montreal federation names executive vice-president

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Danyael Cantor, seven-year director of FEDERATION CJA's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) drive, has been named to succeed Steven Drysdale as the federation's executive vice-president, starting immediately.

The appointment capped a 2½ month search involving about "10 or 11 candidates," search committee chair Robert Vineberg said.

It also will put Cantor, 43 in the community spotlight, front and centre as he takes on the Jewish community's top professional position, as FEDERATION CJA gears up for its 80th anniversary year.

The naming of Cantor came as part of a dual announcement.

Maxyne Finkelstein, director of community planning who was reportedly also vying for the federation's top position, was promoted to a newly created post: executive director of the federation.

The two appointments, at least for the time being, leave open two high-level positions made vacant by the promotions: the directorship of the CJA campaign and community planning department.

Danyael Cantor

Drysdale will "undertake new responsibilities for FEDERATION CJA," the federation said in a press release.

Appeal Court confirms jail term for neo-Nazi

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Court of Appeal recently confirmed a 12-month jail sentence imposed on white supremacist leader George Burdi, calling his attack on a female anti-racist demonstrator "severe and cowardly."

"This was a brutal assault committed in the name of racist ideology," the appeal court stated. "As a result of the assault, the complainant suffered a broken nose, temporarily lost consciousness and had memory problems for weeks."

Employing harsh language to condemn the attack, and the racist ideology that spawned it, the Court of Appeal dismissed Burdi's request that the conviction and sentence be overturned.

The incident that prompted the initial assault charges, trial conviction and subsequent appeal took place in Ottawa in May 1993. At the time, Burdi was leader of Church of the Creator and the lead singer in a band called Ra Ho Wa, which stands for Racial Holy War.

Following a concert, which was picketed by anti-racist demonstrators, Burdi and Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege led a group of neo-Nazis down the streets of Ottawa. As they marched they gave Nazi salutes and chanted "sieg heil."

Near the Chateau Laurier, Burdi "charged across the street to attack the anti-racist demonstrators," the court said. Burdi kicked a young female demonstrator in the face, saying "'this is the [expletive] that started the whole thing.'"

In rejecting Burdi's appeal, the Court of Appeal noted "the march through Ottawa streets was designed by Burdi to incite his neo-Nazi followers to a frenzy of hatred. In this he succeeded and the resulting attack...was an inevitable outcome of his deplorable tactics."

The court agreed with the trial judges assessment that Burdi's "aim in life was to promote hatred, violence and racism...It was not merely the brutality of the assault or the assailant which made the sentence fit, but also the unconscionable racist context in which it took place.

"The purpose of the white supremacist organization of which [Burdi] was a leader was to use violence and hatred for racist ends. The incident on May 29 was a planned and deliberate outgrowth of his malevolent strategy and deserves the strongest possible censure," the court ruled.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada applauded the decision. Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber noted that a 12-month jail term is considered severe for a first offender.

The decision "gives a strong message to hatemongers that their belief system will work against them when it comes to hate-motivated crimes," Farber said.

"The court's condemnation of racism...sends a powerful message that racist violence will not be tolerated in Ontario and that lower court's decisions to enhance the sentences of individuals who commit racially motivated crimes will be upheld," said Rochelle Wilner, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Winnipeg funeral home gets new executive committee

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Chesed Shel Emes, one of North America's few non-profit Jewish funeral homes, has new leadership.

A five-person executive committee was elected to a one-year term beginning Jan. 1. Executive members are co-chairs Hillel Kravetsky and Hart Lazer; treasurer and house chair Rae Margolis; secretary Gordon Pullan; ritual chair Israel Hendler; and constitutional chair and immediate past president Ike Permut.

Shomer Shabbes

"Mr. Permut and the former executive were looking for younger people to participate," says Kravetsky. "We feel that our executive committee is a good blend of old and new members."

Lazer says everything is continuing to function along halachic lines, as always, at the Chesed Shel Emes. All synagogues in the city are in agreement that the funeral home should operate according to Halachah so that its services will remain accessible to all members of the community, says Kravetsky.

On the administrative level, however, the new executive is instituting change by developing written policies and procedures. "We believe that [this] will help future chairpeople," Kravetsky says.

Also new to the Chesed Shel Emes is executive director Rena Boroditsky. "Rena has established a very good rapport with the synagogues," Kravetsky says.

The new executive wants to make Chesed Shel Emes more widely based in the community, Kravetsky says, and he and Lazer have already met with the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and the city's Council of Rabbis.

"We can always use more volunteers," says Lazer. One of the difficulties the organization faces is finding people to prepare according to ritual and watch over the deceased until burial, as dictated by Jewish law.

"Ideally these mitzvot should be done only by people who are shomer Shabbas," says Lazer. "We believe that everyone should have the opportunity to do the mitzvot."

The new executive believes it is important to go out into the community and educate people about the rituals involved in death and burial. "Most people have no idea what to expect until they need this service," says Kravetsky. "This doesn't have to be a mysterious process."

The committee is also planning to undertake an administrative review of its procedures to get a handle on its costs and income. "We aren't going to rush into this though," says Kravetsky. "We can't afford to lose site of our first priority — to provide Winnipeg's Jewish community with affordable burials done according to Halachah."

CUBAN CHILDREN OPEN GIFTS FROM CANADIANS
Some younger members of Havana's Jewish community open Chanukah gifts received from Canadian Jews. Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, arranged the shipment, which included food and religious supplies. The region's Moess Chittin fund financed the purchase, flown to Cuba aboard the private jet of film producer Robert Lantos. CJC has been organizing transport of supplies to Cuba's Jews for about 30 years.

Report warns of 'potentially devastating blow' to schools

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With serious cuts in Quebec goverment funding of Jewish day schools expected in coming years, the community should immediately begin to explore ways of reducing costs, such as raising fees, sharing administrations, regrouping schools with similar ideologies or, in the case of the schools in the worst financial shape, becoming part of the public system, according to the chair of a major study of Jewish education.

Robert Zittrer, a chartered accountant and former Jewish Education Council (JEC) president, headed the Commission on Jewish Education, appointed by FEDERATION CJA to review the educational, administrative and financial needs of day and supplementary schools over the next five years.

The recently released report calls for "contingency plans" against a "potentially...devastating blow" to the schools that would result from the anticipated cutbacks.

The Estates-General on Education report last fall recommended the eventual elimination of all government funding of private schools in Quebec. This month, Education Minister Pauline Marois is expected to make known in her spending estimates how $700 million will be trimmed from her budget.

"Based on the information already provided by the government, new initiatives for revenue generation and cost cutting will have to be explored," Zittrer states in the introduction to the commission's 100-page report.

The suggestion that some schools might go public is based on Bill 107, passed by the former Liberal government to transform the school system from religion-based to language-based. It would allow individual schools to have a denominational character if the parents wished.

The report paints a picture of a day school system that is already in a precarious financial state.

While overall enrolment has been stable, the numbers for the mainstream anglophone schools are down. Some schools are carrying heavy mortgages.

The top recommendation is that FEDERATION CJA increase its grants, currently $1.55 million, until they cover 90 percent of the costs of subsidized students over the next five years. At that level, the projected cost to the community in 2001-02 is $2.35 million.

Supplementary education, such as afternoon and Sunday schools or classes in public schools, is given considerable attention by the commission. It recommends FEDERATION CJA grants increase from $60,000 to $160,000, and that a marketing campaign be launched to raise enrolment from over 900 currently to 2,000.

"While Montreal's communal agencies have traditionally concentrated on day school education, we recognize the importance of strong and effective supplementary school programs in strengthening the Jewish identity of those who choose this option," the report states.

It is also suggested the JEC cooperate pedagogically with the growing number of Judaica programs offered in public, as well as private, schools.

Another major recommendation is improving the teaching of French and Quebec culture in the high schools, both formally and informally. The commission found high school students are losing the fluency in French they gained at the elementary level, where 14 hours of French a week is taught.

The hiring of consultants in educational technology and special education to serve all the schools is also urged. The latter would help schools find ways to keep youngsters who have problems coping with a tri- or quadrilingual curriculum."

A "second chance" program should be set up at Herzliah High School with community funding, to allow students who did not attend elementary Jewish schools to enter Secondary I there, with tutoring in Jewish studies.

Elsewhere, the report calls for "dialogue" with the Federation of Teachers of Jewish Schools (FTJS), the union at most schools, and the JEC, FEDERATION CJA , the principals' association and the Association of Jewish Day Schools.

The commission comments that, at present, talks between the community and the FTJS are limited to collective agreement negotiations, and there is no forum for exchange on educational issues.

Students send aid to Saguenay

MONTREAL — For students attending Montreal Jewish schools, lending a helping hand to those in need is nothing unusual.

Traditionally that help has been sent to fellow Jews in places such as Israel, Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union.

Students from 12 local schools, however, recently chose to offer their assistance to a new location — Quebec's Saguenay region. The area, about 500 kilometres northeast of Montreal, was ravaged last summer by floods that cut a path of disaster through eastern Quebec.

Jewish students, who had learned about the natural disaster in their classrooms, responded by writing letters and shipping toys, books and other gifts to fellow students at Ecole St. Joseph in La Baie and Ecole Polyvalente Frechette in L'Anse St. Jean. Enterprises Dico-Robert also chipped in, sending dictionaries to older high school students.

"It was a very interesting experience for our kids," said Eva Kuper, principal of Jewish People's School and Peretz School in Cote St. Luc. "We organize food drives within the Jewish community all the time, but this was a chance for our students to explore the links that exist among all people."

Gilles Bouchard, principal of Ecole St. Joseph elementary school says his students were delighted to know that fellow Quebec schoolchildren from a different cultural background had taken an interest in their plight.

"The reaction was just incredible," he said by telephone. "They were surprised that kids they didn't know would go out of their way to send along gifts."

The shipment was coordinated by the Jewish Education Council of Montreal, in cooperation with FEDERATION CJA (the Federation of Jewish Community Services of Montreal), the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, the Hellenic Congress of Quebec and the Association of Principals of Jewish Schools.

Budget may benefit charities

province, he said, is two years behind on its charitable regulations. "If they don't follow now, they'll be even more behind."

In Toronto, the budget was praised as having "only positive repercussions" for charitable giving.

In a statement, Michael Daren, vice-chair of UJA Federation's 1997 campaign, said Canada is moving toward completely removing restrictions on charitable giving. "Total donations will not be restricted by someone's income," Daren said. "You'll be able to give however much you want."

Daren said he would like to see even more tax relief for donations of real estate to charities.

CJC had mixed reviews for the budget.

While CJC was "gratified" to see renewed attention to social programs, it expressed concern about the government's ability to maintain standards as it hands more powers to the provinces.

In a statement, Sheva Medjuck, chair of CJC's national law and social action committee, cited the new child tax benefit as "promising in principle" but "well short" of what is required to fight child poverty.

CJC stresses need for job creation

The budget will increase Ottawa's contribution to current child tax benefits, freeing up provincial funds. The provinces have said they would use that money to get people off welfare.

Lowering welfare rolls is laudable, CJC said, but it must be accompanied by job creation.

As well, CJC welcomed more money for children's health programs, but said that must be seen in light of ongoing cuts in transfer payments to provinces.

The establishment of the $150 million Health Transition Fund is also a good step, CJC said, but it too "falls short" of previous recommendations to expand Medicare to include home care and a drug plan.

CJC acknowledged other "positive" features of the budget, including tax relief for persons with disabilities, and the incentives to enhance charitable giving.

Conversion bill concerns U.S. Jewish leaders

Voice concerns with Sharansky

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A delegation of American Jewish leaders representing all streams of Judaism expressed their "deep concern" over pending conversion legislation in a meeting with Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky.

Sharansky met last weekend with the leaders, members of the Jewish Agency for Israel Board of Governors, in his capacity as chair of the ministerial committee on Diaspora affairs.

The leaders, all members of the newly formed Jewish Agency board of governors committee for the unity of the Jewish people, presented Sharansky with a document calling on the government to "abstain from" legislation altering the religious status quo and "not to allow any change in the Law of Return."

The pending conversion bill would ban non-Orthodox conversions in Israel and would prevent Israeli citizens and residents from obtaining them abroad.

Although the bill does not mention conversions performed abroad for non-Israeli residents, some Orthodox Knesset members have said they would seek legislation to curtail the Law of Return.

The Law of Return allows anyone to immigrate to Israel who was born to a Jewish mother or who has been converted to Judaism. For years, Orthodox parties have sought to amend the law to require that conversions be carried out by Orthodox rabbis.

But Israeli leaders, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, have balked at legislation that would alter the long-standing policy of recognizing Reform and Conservative conversions abroad.

According to a Jewish Agency statement released after the meeting, the leaders asked Sharansky to keep an open mind about issues of concern to American Jews.

Eric Yoffie, president of the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations, told Sharansky, "Just as you ask us to understand Israeli reality, you have to understand the reality of U.S. Jewry," according to the statement.

"So that we will remain one people, three million Reform Jews need to know that the government of Israel understands them, knows them, is aware of their problems and considers them legitimate," Yoffie said.

After the meeting, Vera Golovensky, Sharansky's adviser on Diaspora affairs, said that even though the minister recognizes "the political reality in Israel," he also seeks to prevent a further erosion of the religious rights of Reform and Conservative Jews.

While the meeting was in progress, about a dozen Reform and Conservative activists held a small vigil outside the ministry building protesting the conversion bill.

One of the protesters, Yoram Danker, said he had braved the stormy weather because the state refuses to recognize his 5-year-old daughter as Jewish.

"We adopted her five years ago and went to the rabbinate to have her converted," Danker says. "We were told that she could not be converted unless we lived an Orthodox lifestyle. I'm from an Orthodox family, but I'm not Orthodox."

Danker said his daughter's Conservative conversion had not been recognized by Israel's Ministry of the Interior, which issues identity cards.

"I want my daughter's identity card to say she is Jewish. I feel this country owes me that much."

Palestinians oppose Israeli expansion

By JON IMMANUEL AND DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority cabinet issued a sharply worded statement after its recent meeting in Gaza, warning that the situation in Jerusalem is "explosive" and that Israel is delivering "a fatal blow" to the peace process with its plans to build a new neighborhood across the Green Line.

The statement said, "The Palestinian leadership is very worried by the explosive situation in the City of Jerusalem after the latest Israeli claims which are designed to isolate the city and Al-Aksa Mosque from the rest of the West Bank.

"The Israeli government gave itself the illegal right to change the current status quo, violating all the international agreements, the Oslo agreement and US guarantees. ... It is trying to change the historical, demographic, legal and geographic position of the entire city. ... It is aiming a fatal blow at the peace process. Noble Jerusalem is a red line and there is no peace between the two peoples without a just peace in Jerusalem, and [while] denying the rights of our people in their city and in their holy land."

The statement followed comments by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that he would bring the matter of beginning to build at Har Choma to the cabinet for approval next week. Netanyahu tried to sweeten the development for Palestinians last week by promising up to 1,000 units for Arabs. Faisal Husseini, the senior Palestinian official in Jerusalem, rejected this, saying it was like offering back a small part of stolen goods.

The Palestinian warnings of violence are backed by last September's riots which killed 70 people when the Western Wall tunnel exit was opened, in which the threat to Al-Aksa, though unfounded, was invoked. The issue unites all Palestinian factions and at the opening of a national dialogue conference to begin in Nablus with the participation of all Palestinian factions, including Hamas, Israeli plans in Jerusalem are certain to be the major rallying point.

Prior to Netanyahu's visit to Jordan, the country's Prime Minister Abdul Karim Kabariti called on Netanyahu not to build in eastern Jerusalem.

Government may fall: minister

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The government will have to resign and new elections will have to be held if either Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu or Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi is found to have been directly involved in the Bar-On affair, Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said last week.

Kahalani spoke after Channel 1 reported that part of the police questioning of Netanyahu last week was held under caution. Channel 1 commentator Amnon Abramovitz said Netanyahu evaded many questions, and replied to others "I don't know" and "I don't remember," even though they referred to events of a few weeks ago.

In addition, the police found several contradictions between Netanyahu's testimony and that of cabinet secretary Danny Naveh.

However, Netanyahu adviser David Bar-Illan, while refusing to comment on the nature of the investigation, said, "I'm sure that no one in the Prime Minister's Office will be implicated in any kind of wrongdoing."

The latest developments in the investigation are creating political turmoil, and both coalition and opposition politicians began speaking over the weekend of the possibility of the government's falling in the wake of the inquiry.

Speaking to Army Radio, Kahalani said there are red lines which if crossed mean the end of the government. He said if a charge sheet is presented against the prime minister, "The government will fall, it will not be able to continue functioning, because it will be losing the public's confidence. At this stage, [if this happens,] I think, it must resign."

In other developments in the case, Channel 1 reporter Ayala Hasson reported that Roni Bar-On's name was to have been raised as a candidate for attorney general on Jan. 3 in the cabinet, a week before he was appointed.

However, the plan to bring up Bar-On's name on Jan. 3 was put off, after Netanyahu was warned separately by three attorneys — Dan Avi-Yitzhak, David Shimron and Yitzhak Molcho — not to appoint him. Shimron said the appointment "smelled bad" and also warned of the damage it could cause.

On that same day, Israel Radio broadcast the report that Shas was considering not supporting the Hebron agreement. Hasson said that Aryeh Deri, who was furious that Bar-On's candidacy was not promoted in the cabinet, was behind the radio report.

Director-general of the Prime Minister's Office Avigdor Lieberman said following that report, "Deri is sending us threats on the Hebron agreement," Hasson reported.

He also revealed that the police investigators were astounded to discover identical phrasing in the testimonies of a number of people, of all ranks, which left no doubt in investigators' minds that they had coordinated their versions of events.

Avi-Yitzhak denied on the Channel 1's reports by Abramovitz and Michael Doron that he provided the police with recordings of his conversations with Deri and other involved parties.

He also denied having discussed the possibility of a plea bargain with Deri in November, and that he ever asked to be attorney general, discussed it with Deri or tried to "sell" him the idea of a general pardon on the state's 50th anniversary.

Hanegbi is believed to be one of several individuals scheduled to be questioned again this week as the investigation continues, with some to be questioned under warning. Several other individuals who have not yet been questioned also will be called in to clear up matters raised in the investigation.

The State Attorney's Office is to begin taking a more active role in the case and will soon have to decide whether there is enough material to file indictments, police sources said. Police believe indictments could be filed against some of the suspects, at least for breach of trust, but such a decision will not be easy since it will depend on legal interpretations of the facts.

Netanyahu may be called on to testify again, police sources said. Police said Netanyahu may have been guilty of breach of trust if he indeed gave in to Deri's and others' alleged blackmail attempt, and thereby decided on Bar-On's appointment.

Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo, a prominent Likud figure, called on Netanyahu to form a national unity government immediately, as a way out of his predicament vis-a-vis the Bar-On affair.

West Bank homes flooded

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — More than 500 homes in Kalansuwa village in northern Israel were flooded when two rivers overflowed after a torrential rain swept the area last Saturday.

Scores of people were trapped in their homes and had to be rescued, initially by bulldozers and tractors because the flood water was too deep for trucks, and later in a rubber dinghy with an outboard motor brought in by the navy.

Soldiers from the Home Front Command and police also helped with the rescue operations.

"Kalansuwa has been turned into Venice," local council chair Yusef Takaruri said.

"More than 500 homes have been swamped and all the roads and streets are under water, to a depth of between one and 1½ metres.

"I am calling on the prime minister himself to intervene and help resolve the problems here for us because the Agriculture and Interior ministries have not solved the problems.

"Our agriculture also has been hit, with greenhouses destroyed and fields flooded. We can't put up with the situation every two, three or four years," he said.

Flooding also was reported in the centre of Nahariya, as well as other problems on many roads in the northern and central districts, which were the hardest hit by the cold, wet front.

Heavy snow blocked roads on the Golan and a special mission had to be mounted by Magen David Adom to take a pregnant woman, apparently about to deliver her baby, from Majdal Shams to Tzfat's Rebecca Sieff Hospital.

The Hermon ski site was closed because of the heavy snowfall, although staff said the centre would open later in the week for skiers and visitors, when the weather clears.

In another weather-related drama, police and members of the Golan mountain rescue team plucked 10 people to safety after they were stranded in their vehicles in thick mud and flood waters in the Jordan River channel north of the Arik bridge.

TORONTO — Dror Zeigerman, Israel's former consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, has been appointed by the Foreign Ministry of Israel as its next ambassador to Great Britain. Zeigerman is expected to take up his responsibilities in December.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 17

• The Supreme Court reduced the three-month prison sentence of former Kach activist Baruch Marzel to three months community service. Marzel was convicted of causing public disorder in calling Faisal Husseini a murderer.

• Israel filed a complaint with the Palestinian Authority concerning attempts by Palestinian officials to persuade a Bedouin tracker for the IDF to spy on Israel.

Feb. 18

• Immigration dropped by about eight percent in 1996 to 70,600. More than 80 percent of immigrants to Israel arrived from the former Soviet Union.

• Police questioned Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at his office, in connection with allegations that the short-lived appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general was part of a political deal.

Feb. 19

• Israel summoned the Egyptian ambassador to express its displeasure over Egypt's decision to charge Israeli, Azam Azam, with espionage. Foreign Minister David Levy called upon the United States to intervene on Azam's behalf.

Feb. 20

• The hard-line Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine announced that it renounced the use of violence against Israel and wants to play a constructive role in Israel-Palestine relations.

• Shas Knesset member Aryeh Deri denied his former lawyer's claim that he had been involved in an alleged political regarding Roni Bar-On.

Feb.21

• Internal Minister Avigdor Kahalani denied reports he had wiretapped rival Ronni Milo during the 1993 Tel Aviv mayoral campaign. "It never happened; I'm as straight as a ruler," Kahalani told reporters.

Courts in Israel expanding their role

The first question in the first class on my first day of law school at the Hebrew University seemed easy: The professor wanted to know if Israel has a constitution. Indeed, several students raised their hands and, stating the obvious, said no.

They were wrong. The rest of the year was spent discussing the unwritten constitution of Israel, i.e. the relationships among the various branches of government. Of course, Israel doesn't have a formal, written constitution, and the courts in this country traditionally took a careful approach in interpreting their powers.

Even so, some of the bolder judges overturned bureaucratic decisions which violated civil rights. Such judgments were based on the fundamental principles of a democratic country, such as freedom of speech and equality before the law.

Over the past couple of decades, the Supreme Court has intervened more and more in actions of the government and its bodies, developing the theory that all governmental actions have to be legal, and to be legal they have to be reasonable. Judges have stated that a decision isn't reasonable if it is blatantly discriminatory or one-sided or if the person making it doesn't consider all the relevant information.

The expanding role of the courts, while not always consistent, and not always progressive, has gradually created a list of rights which, even without a written constitution, protect the citizen. Nowadays, every government minister and clerk knows that decisions can be subjected to judicial review, and even overturned.

The courts no longer permit seemingly arbitrary decisions, or those which would curtail basic human liberties with no pressing need (of course the one major exception is where security is involved, but even that is often carefully scrutinized by the courts).

We've even reached the point where the president of the Supreme Court, Aharon Barak, is of the opinion that there is no issue so political or controversial that the courts are excluded.

According to Barak, the court may even dictate whether a soldier can move to the right or to the left. The court may choose not to get involved in a particular issue, but it has the right to if it feels that intervention is warranted.

Nevertheless, the courts always had a red line – they wouldn't overturn Knesset legislation. Over the course of the 1980s, the judges skated close to this red line, canceling decisions of the Knesset (as opposed to actual laws). These decisions usually involved the internal workings of the Knesset, such as the decision to deny then MK Meir Kahane the right to speak.

The real change came when the Knesset passed a series of laws which form the nucleus of a written constitution. The Basic Law of Human Dignity and Freedom, for example, forbids violation of the life, person and respect of a human being, and delineates rights to property, freedom of movement and privacy. These fundamental rights are based on the recognition of the value of the person, the sanctity of human life and freedom. For the first time, the courts can overturn a law which violates these basic freedoms. Barak has called this a "constitutional revolution."

The judges' readiness to intervene (at least some of them) has set the stage for some monumental struggles among the various branches of government because not everyone agrees that the justices of the Supreme Court should be acting as an upper chamber of the Knesset.

In essence, the question is, when does the court cross the line from determining whether an action is legal to actually setting policy? The answer is harder than it may seem.

We have already seen the beginnings of this battle. One example occurred recently when the court ruled that the Ministry of the Interior has to recognize Conservative and Reform conversions.

In another case, the court ordered local religious councils to permit Conservative and Reform representatives to take their seats, against the will of the Orthodox establishment. Several legislators have demanded that the Knesset overturn these rulings, and there is talk of restricting the court's powers.

Some people believe it is undemocratic for a group of appointed people to overrule the will of the government and the legislature. Others see the expanded role of the Supreme Court as the last bastion of human rights, the real protector of democracy. It seems that the only consensus in the country is that we are witnessing a struggle which will determine the nature of Israeli society.

This space will be devoted to trying to convey this aspect of existence in Israel – from the large, constitutional questions, to some everyday issues which touch the lives of Israelis or even of Jews overseas. Some of the issues may be political, others might appear trivial or arcane.

All of them, however, help make up the fabric of life in Israel.

Jonathan Shiff grew up in Canada but now practises law in Jerusalem.

Netanyahu meets Hussein in Amman

will continue," he said.

Netanyahu said that in final talks with the Palestinians, "we shall need to formalize the status, free status, of the three religions in Jerusalem.

"They will have unimpeded access as they do now to their holy sites," he said. "This is something that I think could be codified and formalized in a final settlement and when the time comes...this will be presented by the Israeli side."

Netanyahu's six-hour visit to Jordan marks the first time the premier has held extensive talks with King Hussein since ties between the two countries deteriorated in the aftermath of the opening of the Western Wall Tunnel exit last September.

When asked by the Jerusalem Post whether he feels his personal ties with Netanyahu and bilateral ties between the two countries have been normalized after a half-year interregnum, King Hussein responded, "[Our] relations are extremely cordial. We are very, very frank. We are very open with each other. I think we both act responsibly and I hope we will be able to jointly or individually make our contribution towards the target, which is a comprehensive peace."

He appealed to the media "to give us a chance to address problems without jumping to conclusions, without making speculations.

"We don't want to conduct our policy through the media," he said, noting that the "foundations" existed for a "good atmosphere" to conduct negotiations.

During the same period, officials held parallel talks on other bilateral issues, such as trade and water.

Perhaps the key bilateral issue was Israel's willingness to forgo the establishment of an Aqaba-Eilat airport along the border and to agree that it was more feasible to build an international airport solely in Aqaba, with special arrangements to be made for Israel.

Lubavitch seeks to reclaim properties in Russia

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The Lubavitch movement is planning to ask the Russian government for properties that used to belong to the group.

With this goal in mind, the movement is reorganizing itself in an effort to show the government it is far from being a new group in Russia and that its current activities represent the continuation of a two-century-old Lubavitch presence in the country.

Lubavitch representatives working in Russia gathered last month in Moscow to set up a new body, Agudas Chassidei Chabad Russia.

The new organization will serve as a Moscow-based umbrella group for all Lubavitch-affiliated institutions now operating in Russia.

It will also seek to demonstrate to Russian authorities that the Lubavitch movement, despite its global operations, is working in Russia as a grassroots movement, Lubavitch officials say.

Russian officials do not "like it much when foreigners come and tell them what to do," said Berel Lazar, chair of the Rabbinical Alliance of the Commonwealth of Independent States, the organization of Lubavitch rabbis working across the former Soviet Union (FSU).

"Our message is that we are not foreign in this country, we are local, we are based in the local communities," he added.

After the Russian body is created, Lubavitch officials want to launch an even broader organization that would operate throughout the FSU, where the Lubavitch movement runs dozens of Jewish day schools and Sunday schools.

Most rabbis now working in the FSU are emissaries of the Lubavitch movement.

While some work in the largest cities, others serve in far-flung communities, including towns in Siberia and the Caucasus Mountains.

Lazar said the activity is to let the government know that the Lubavitch movement in the FSU is thriving and that "all that once belonged to it should be given back."

The list of properties that the movement wants returned includes buildings that once housed Lubavitch facilities and properties associated with the succession of Lubavitch rebbes, the movement's spiritual leaders.

Among those buildings is a house located in the southern Russian town of Rostov-on-Don that once belonged to the fifth Lubavitcher rebbe, Sholom Ber Schneerson. The building is now used as an apartment building.

But the efforts may be stymied by Russian law, which allows religious groups to reclaim houses of worship that had been confiscated during the Communist era, but says nothing about other kinds of former communal property.

Lubavitch officials also seek the return of archival documents, most importantly, the Schneerson library.

The library, which consists of 12,000 volumes of books and manuscripts that had been collected by five generations of Lubavitch rebbes, is now stored in the Russian State Library, formerly known as the Lenin Library.

The disputed collection had been confiscated in the early 1920s by Soviet authorities and transferred to the Lenin Library.

The Lubavitch movement has been battling in the Moscow courts since 1990 for the return of the books.

Polish bill gets mixed reaction

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

POLAND – Poland's parliament has approved a bill on state relations with Jewish communities which will allow its nine tiny surviving communities to recover some property lost during and after the Holocaust.

Nazi invaders robbed and murdered most of Poland's 3.5 million Jews during the war and communal property such as synagogues, schools, and ritual baths were then taken over by Poland's post-war communist authorities.

The bill, which easily cleared the lower house but must still pass through the Senate to become law, will provide a legal framework for the surviving congregations, numbering 3,000 to 5,000 Jews, to reclaim some property.

Pawel Wildstein, head of the Union of Jewish Communities in Poland, cautiously welcomed the bill but said it had flaws. "The union and I are fairly pleased that after 800 years of our existence on Polish soil we have got a basic document like this law regulating relations between the state and the Jews," Wildstein told Reuters.

He criticized some aspects of the bill, including a clause preventing claims on property which has already been sold or passed on to third parties such as private individuals.

The government estimates that there are some 1,100 cemeteries, 350 synagogues, 28 funeral homes, 27 schools, as well as hospitals and other sites that once belonged to Jewish groups.

Some Polish critics of the bill argued it might allow the tiny Jewish minority to inherit a huge legacy which it could not use, while depriving current occupants of such assets.

The cash-starved Jewish congregations expect to reclaim some property and derive income from others to pay bills, provide social welfare for the old or look after cemeteries which have fallen into ruin or been vandalized without anyone to tend them.

Wildstein ridiculed talk that the property Jewish bodies could potentially reclaim represented huge fortunes. "These are half-destroyed remnants of synagogue walls, these are 1,064 cemeteries, knocked down, wrecked, profaned. Even if we just tried to put walls up around these cemeteries...the money would not pay for one half," he said.

Jewish organizations abroad, which have long been pressing the Polish government to settle property issues left over from the Holocaust and the communist era, were much more critical of the bill.

"This is a minimalist bill and does not give back the Jewish communities the possession of properties that belonged to them before 1939," said Naphtali Lavie, vice-chair of the Israel-based World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO).

"This law simply legitimizes the plundering and theft of Jewish property on the part of the Nazis in 1939 and the Polish government which inherited the property after 1945," said Lavie.

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — YAHWEH! is a compelling exhibition of photo-based work by local artist Simon Glass.

On view from Feb. 6 to March 8 at Gallery 44, it addresses the themes of Jewish history, language, folklore and religion.

Featured are four suites (or groupings) of silver prints that combine photographic images with Hebrew text, thus creating a series of juxtapositions and seeming contradictions.

Yahweh, the first suite, is comprised of four prints displaying the letters that spell the unutterable name of G-d in a 6-foot-high vertical column. The brilliant white letters are superimposed upon photographs taken in 1945, after the liberation of various concentration camps.

Although the photos illustrate the emaciated corpses of Holocaust victims, the contrast provided by the white Hebrew lettering overpowers the dark images.

"What I'm trying to do with the Hebrew letters has to do with connecting them to Jewish ideas and these specific events in history," says Glass.

The Book of Formation suite features 22 silver prints, each with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in the texture of skin derived from up-close photographs Glass shot of various men and women. Drawing from an ancient kabbalistic creation myth, Sepher Yetsira, or Book of Formation, the group encapsulates the concept that the entire universe is created from the letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

In Book of Formation, Glass arranges these letters in such a pattern that, according to many interpretations of the Sepher Yetsira, they can be used to animate a clay figure such as the golem.

Glass enlivens the letters of the Hebrew alphabet by punctuating them with the textures of human skin.

Merciful and Gracious includes nine silver prints, each a photograph taken by the Nazis of prisoners at Auschwitz. Glass took these photos from the Archive of the Polish State Museum at Auschwitz and placed a Hebrew letter on each to spell the words rachum v'chanun, merciful and gracious, two of the Thirteen Attributes of G-d. Behind these ornate letters rest the pallid faces of Jewish and non-Jewish prisoners bearing identification numbers.

Golem I and Golem II is the final suite and features two silver prints, each an out-of-focus photograph of a child bathed in deep shades of blue. Written upon the foreheads of these two anonymous children is the word emet, truth.

"I chose children because I picture children as being a symbol of hope and positivity and looking towards the future," Glass says.

In addition, Glass selected the word emet because, according to Jewish folklore, it also appeared on the forehead of the golem, a clay creature who was brought to life to protect the Jews.

"It seemed particularly appropriate that folklore about a creature called to life to protect the Jews from their enemies is still relevant," Glass says.

However, the golem could be brought to a halt by its master by removing the letter aleph to spell met, or death.

As with all of his suites, Glass juxtaposes the narration of truth with the stark realities of death, always with the promise of hope and the power of creation.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Jerry Lewis Stars in Damn Yankees

While Jewish film buffs continue to debate whether the buffoonish character that Jerry Lewis played in many of his films was a shlemiel or shlemazel, most agree that he is one of the brilliant comics of our time. He appears at the Hummingbird Centre March 12 to 16 in Damn Yankees, a musical comedy about a passionate baseball fan who sells his soul to the devil to become a great baseball player.

A revival of the 1950s-era show opened on Broadway two years ago and is now making a 36-city tour. At 70, Lewis seems as frenetically funny as he was in the days when he and Dean Martin were partners in their famous comic duo. Eight performances only. Tickets $28 to $73. 416-872-2262.

Music Notes

• The Raye Horowitz Concert, featuring the Penderecki String Quartet, features musical selections by Viktor Ullman and Pavel Haas, prominent Terezin composers who died at Auschwitz. Formed in Poland in 1986, the quartet is now based in Waterloo, but performs around the world. Jewish Music Toronto, Leah Posluns Theatre, March 4, 8 p.m. Adults $20. 416-636-1880, ext. 231.

Prizes & Competitions

• Bitter Apples, by Victoria Keidan of Alliston, Ont., is the winner of the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto's sixth Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest. A solid intergenerational drama, the play is slated to receive a professionally directed staged rehearsed reading in mid-May at the Bloor JCC, the committee's sponsor. Keidan is a professional playwright with several produced plays to her credit. For details, call Bill Emery, 416-924-6211.

• B&A Fiction Magazine is sponsoring a fiction contest for original unpublished stories of 2,500 words or less, in any genre. Prizes are a course valued up to $1,000 at the Humber School for Writers, books valued at $1,000 from Random House, Knopf and Vintage Canada, and $500 from B&A. Fee: $18 per story (includes a one-year subscription). Put your name, phone and story title(s) on a separate page. Entries must be postmarked by March 11. B&A Fiction Contest, Box 702, Stn. P, Toronto M5S 2Y4. 416-535-1233.

Shlemiel or Shlemazel?

"The American distinction between the shlemiel and the shlemazel, summarized in the rule of thumb that says the former spills the soup, the latter is the one into whose lap it falls, provides a helpful basis for definition," writes Ruth Wisse in her book The Schlemiel As Modern Hero. "The shlemiel is the active disseminator of bad luck, and the schlemazel its passive victim. Or, more sharply defined, the shlemazel happens upon mischance, he has a penchant for lucklessness, but the unhappy circumstances remain outside him, and always suggest the slapstick quality of surprise. The schlemiel's misfortune is his character. It is not accidental, but essential."

In The Spotlight

Named "sterling support" in the Globe and Mail's year-end theatre round-up for her role in Teresa Tova's acclaimed two-woman show Still The Night, Toronto-based Liza Balkan has been an actor, singer and dancer for some 20 years, both here and in New York, where she studied.

That was Balkan you saw prancing catlike across the stage in the Toronto production of Cats about a decade ago. She has also appeared at the Blyth Festival and in numerous other theatrical venues around southern Ontario. Several years ago she staged Leftovers, her own one-woman show.

Besides playing Little Bryna in Still The Night, Balkan helped shape Tova's beguiling Holocaust story, which may be remounted as a touring production next season. In the meantime, she's keeping busy.

For one thing, Balkan is co-writing and choreographing a dance project for Toronto's Buddies In Bad Times Theatre. She is also revising her second one-woman show, Wedding Number, which she performed at the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre for a week last December. "It's about a woman who does catering in synagogues and is coming to terms with her own Jewish identity — and lack thereof."

Chava Albertstein

Israeli chanteuse to perform at gala concert

TORONTO — Israeli singer Chava Alberstein will perform in a gala concert at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on March 3 at 8 p.m.

The concert is jointly sponsored by Beth Tikvah and the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University, Toronto chapter.

Alberstein's records have become hits in Israel and North America, and several have gone gold and platinum. Her repertoire includes a wide range of songs in Hebrew, Yiddish and English. This is Alberstein's first Toronto appearance since 1989.

The concert is part of a campaign honoring Beth Tikvah's 30th anniversary and the Ben-Gurion University Toronto chapter's 18th anniversary.

Tickets are $36. For further information, phone Beth Tikvah Synagogue 416-221-3433 or Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University 416-665-8054.

Leo Rosten, author and Yiddishist, dies at 88

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Leo Rosten, the language maven whose books introduced millions of people around the world to the pleasures of Yiddish, died last week at the age of 88.

Rosten was born in Lodz, Poland, and was brought to the United States as a young child.

He had a distinguished career in the U.S. government as a consultant to the secretary of war and as a social scientist. However, he was best known as a writer.

Among Rosten's more famous works were The Education of Hyman Kaplan, its sequel The Return of Hyman Kaplan, which were both written under the pen name Leonard Q. Ross, Captain Newman, M.D., and The Joys of Yiddish.

Israel's miniature Grand Canyon mesmerizes visitors

By JOSIE NEWMAN
Special to The CJN

THE NEGEV — The undulating curves and ever-changing colors of the Negev Mountains spread before us in a mesmerizing panorama as our jeep driver ground the gears when we bounced over an especially big rut. In my mind's eye, I could see the camel caravans of the Nabateans, spice-traders from the Dead Sea area in the first century BCE, cresting the horizon.

Our driver guides, Ravid and Gil, eventually brought us to a khan, a sort of ancient desert hotel built from stone where the Nabateans would stop for the night on their way to Europe. We were very close to the Ramon Crater, reputed to be the largest known crater on earth. The crater, which is also designated a national geological park, is 40 kilometres long and nine kilometres wide. Park Ramon is home to a variety of vegetation and animals such as ibex, gazelles, wolves, foxes, leopards and rare reptiles, some of which we saw.

Ravid and Gil pulled the jeep over beside a wadi, a dry river bed, which had an incredible amount of plant life growing around it considering the area only gets five or six days of rain per year. We stood under an acacia tree with a vulture's nest built precariously in one of its middle limbs and were given a thorough explanation by Ravid about the nearby bush and its place in the history of the Bedouin people who used to populate the area.

If a Bedouin shepherd boy was attracted to a girl and wanted to propose marriage to her – the Bedouin culture doesn't believe in courtship –he would do it wordlessly by tying one of the branches of the bush in a knot, hide in the hills and wait until the girl passed by the bush. If she stopped to untie the knot, it meant she accepted the proposal: otherwise, the boy was rejected.

The park and crater are in the middle of the Negev Desert in the south of Israel, an area which resembles a miniature Grand Canyon. The crater and nearby Mitzpe Ramon attract hordes of Israeli tourists each year and an increasing number of visitors from other countries.

The Ramon Inn Hotel where we stayed in Mitzpe Ramon was filled with young families wearing hiking boots and knapsacks, ready to explore the crater and surrounding desert area.

Jeep trips

Ravid, 25, and Gil, 33, both joined Desert Shade Tours while on furlough from the Israeli army. They are both experts in the ways of the desert and its inhabitants. The tour we took involved a 2½ hour afternoon drive in the desert and a camel ride on the desert's edge at dusk.

The company usually conducts two or three jeep trips and around five camel rides per day. Desert Shade also offers several more intensive packages, including hiking and camping in the Ramon Crater, camel riding and a jeep tour along the Nabatean spice route and an ultimate five day/four night desert safari of hiking, camel-riding and jeeps in the Negev.

After an exhilarating jeep trek, Ravid and Gil drove us back to company headquarters, a stone building meant to resemble a Bedouin tent, with cabins and bunks behind it for tourists who want to stay overnight or longer.

There, at the edge of the desert, we took a short camel ride and watched the sun slide behind the horizon, casting startling oranges and pinks on the beautiful mountains of the Negev. Within minutes, it was dark and we felt the sharp chill of the desert's night air.

The Negev in Israel is made up of several tourist regions – the Northern and Western Negev, the Negev Highlands and the Eilat Region.

The Northern Negev is best known for Beersheva, its eclectic capital city, near where Abraham and Isaac lived and tended their flocks. The Northern Negev is a transitional area between the desert and the fertile coastal regions.

The Amalekites, Canaanites and Philistines fought for control of the region and left a lot of archeological remains. The Bedouin Heritage Centre, in Rahat north of Beersheva, shows visitors authentic Bedouin tents with women spinning sheep's wool and preparing pita dough.

The Negev Highlands, in the centre of the Negev, are where the mountains and the Ramon Crater are. The Negev Highlands Nature Reserve runs from Mitzpa Ramon on south – it is the largest reserve in Israel and contains the Izin Stream, the second largest in the Negev. In the same general area are the Tzinim and East Ramon Nature Reserve and the Ashosh Stream Reserve.

The Lilot Region, in the southeast near the Egyptian border, is in the midst of the Syrian-African Rift and is full of many colorful rocks. There are many canyons and the Arava Valley which boasts an African savannah of acacia trees and shrubs.

More information can be obtained about Desert Shade Tours by writing 10 Dov Fridman St., Ramat-Gan 52503 or telephoning 972-3-5756885.

The Israel Government Tourist Office can provide extensive information on the Negev. They can be contacted at 964-3784.

Artists Fleeing Hitler: A groundbreaking exhibition that explores the impact of forced exile on the lives and works of European artists during the Nazi era opens this week at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art.

Exiles and Emigres: The Flight of European Artists from Hitler focuses on the work of 23 well-known painters, sculptors, photographers and architects who were, like many others, driven out of Germany and later out of Europe.

Artists include Josef Albers, Max Beckmann, Marcel Breuer, Marc Chagall, Salvador Dali, Max Ernst, Andreas and Lyonel Feininger, Walter Gropius, George Grosz, Wassily Kandinsky, Jacques Lipchitz, Ludwig Mies van der Rohe and Piet Mondrian. The show closes May 11 in Los Angeles. It runs June 19 to Sept. 7 at the Museum of Fine Arts in Montreal, then goes to Berlin.

Business Brief

Diagnosis by TV phone

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Shahal emergency medicine company has unveiled the country's first home application of the integrated services digital network (ISDN) – a TV phone that lets subscribers and Shahal centre doctors see each other and speed diagnosis.

The TV phone, manufactured by British Telecom, links up with Bezeq's ISDN lines.

Images on the 12.7-centimetre color screen are very crisp and lifelike, but the service is not cheap: NIS 5,400 for the device (which is the size of three stacked Tel Aviv phone books) plus NIS 480 for the ISDN phone line.

Shahal, which has 40,000 subscribers around the country for its other services, and charges NIS 150 - NIS 200 per month, does not intend to rent out the phones at present, but only to sell them.

The innovation, which elicited much interest, was kept carefully under wraps: Shahal staffers themselves were shown the device only recently.

Prof. Arye Roth, a medical adviser for Shahal, noted that heart patients are typically reluctant to seek help when suffering symptoms, believing they will go away. This makes the average time between suffering heart attack symptoms and going to the hospital about three hours.

The delay significantly increases the risk of death, as medications to dissolve blood clots in a coronary artery are most effective when administered shortly after the attack. Shahal, which has until now offered a service transmitting electrocardiograms over a phone line, has reduced the delay time to an average of only 44 minutes among its subscribers.

The TV phone is expected to shrink this period even more. Patients with the device feel that medical staff are with them in their home rather than far away, which reduces anxiety about getting ill, Shahal officials said.

SAD a common winter ailment

By HAYLEY WINE
Connecticut Jewish Ledger

For some people, the winter months are depressing. Hitting the slopes and drinking steaming mugs of hot chocolate in front of the fireplace is not, to them, nirvana.

Dr. Dan Oren, assistant professor of psychiatry at Yale University understands.

"This is more than people simply experiencing the winter time blues," says Oren, an expert on Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD). "SAD is a biological depression brought on specifically by the loss of light."

In the winter months the days are shorter, he says. "Even when the sun is up in the winter it's not as high in the sky, which means it is not as bright. In the winter we have on average more rain, snow and overcast skies."

Symptoms of SAD, he says, include recurring feelings of sadness or unhappiness. "People afflicted with SAD want to sleep a lot. They also experience weight gain in the winter. Children may have difficulty concentrating or performing in school."

Although rare, he says, those with severe cases may may be plagued with thoughts of suicide.

He says that that 75 percent of those afflicted with SAD are women and the condition does not seem to be as much of a problem for the elderly.

Typically, Oren says, the average age of onset is the early 20s. However, he adds, some people recall having SAD in early childhood.

Treatment for SAD varies. "For people with mild symptoms, just taking a walk on a sunny day can make a difference," he says."For those who can, vacations to sunny places might work. Those who can't get away can be treated with a florescent light box that produces a bright light from a small area. If necessary, some people are treated with anti-depressants," adds Oren.

Treatment for most people lasts only throughout the winter because, during the summer, people who experience SAD are usually fine, he says.

Oren's interest in SAD stems from his days as a student at Yale. As a chemistry major, he studied the effects of light on organic molecules. While he was doing his medical residency, more and more attention was being paid to the disorder. "I thought this was an interesting puzzle, and I went to work to try to solve it," Oren said.

Currently, he is recruiting volunteers for a study on whether human blood absorbs light in the same way as does plant chlorophyll.

SAD has drawn more attention in recent years because more and more people are reporting symptoms, Oren says. "People know there is an effective treatment."

Chasm between Orthodoxy and feminism closing

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Being an Orthodox Jewish feminist has long meant trying to straddle two worlds based on diametrically opposed values.

International Conference on Orthodoxy & Feminism

The first International Conference on Orthodoxy & Feminism, held here this week made it clear that Orthodox women and the rabbis who support them feel that they are slowly but surely bridging the chasm between those worlds.

"Ten years ago, we felt on the fringe," said Freda Rosenfeld, a consultant on breastfeeding and childbirth educator who lives in the Flatbush section of Brooklyn.

"Now we are definitely mainstream," she said, looking around the hotel hallway at some of the estimated 700 women and sprinkling of men at the conference.

The unexpectedly large turnout included women with uncovered heads wearing pants and those with long skirts and wigs.

All of them described themselves as modern or centrist Orthodox. The gathering also drew a few chassidic women, a few Conservative women and at least one Reconstructionist.

Author Cynthia Ozick "once called Orthodox feminism an oxymoron and it long was," conference chair Blu Greenberg, who first conceived the concept of such a gathering, said in an interview. "But it isn't anymore."

Letty Cottin Pogrebin

A feeling of religious ferment and change, excitement and apprehension was almost palpable, as was, for many women, a sense of relief that they were finally among like-minded people.

"It feels good to be here because there aren't that many Orthodox feminists" in Seattle, said Karen Treiger, who came in with her sister-in-law. In spite of her community's relatively small size, her year-old women's prayer group has already attracted 30 regular participants, she said.

Letty Cottin Pogrebin, an author and founder of the secular women's movement, said the conference reminded her of the feminist movement's earliest years.

"Something really new is happening" for Orthodox women, she said. At the conference, "there were moments of high consciousness that things were happening here that hadn't happened before."

While participants had no illusions that their gains would spread to the haredi community, they came away, almost to a woman, feeling they had accomplished something revolutionary. The most important outcome of the conference, said many participants, was that the nine Orthodox rabbis who spoke at various sessions said publicly that there is room for change in women's roles within the parameters of Jewish law.

"It's earthshaking that rabbis are saying for the first time that their hands are not tied by distance from Sinai," said Shelley Frier List of Baltimore.

Orthodox women have been expanding their religious roles over the last two decades, at first reclaiming traditional women's observances such as Rosh Chodesh at the start of a new month by gathering in meetings that have evolved into women's prayer groups.

Innovations have evolved from there. A generation ago, a girl's 12th birthday passed without ceremony.

Today, a bat mitzvah is often celebrated in one of the approximately 40 women's prayer groups that exist around the world, with the girl learning the appropriate blessings, reciting her Torah portion and delivering a sermon on its meaning, much as a boy would.

There are also other, quieter changes, such as the fact that a growing number of baby boys, when named at their circumcision, are being described in the blessing as the son of their mother, as well as their father.

And in some Orthodox synagogues, a Torah scroll is passed behind the mechitzah dividing the sexes, so that women can touch the Torah after it is read as men have always done.

Orthodox rabbis are always consulted before changes are instituted, but the requests are often coming from women who know which rabbis they can turn to for approval.

Deference to rabbinic authorities is a deeply inculcated value in the Orthodox community, and modesty has been regarded as one of the most valued traits a woman can possess. But conference participants openly challenged the limits of religious leaders' sway over their lives when they find the rule is oppressive.

For instance, on the issue of agunot, women whose husbands refuse them the get, the divorce that only men can issue, female activists and a handful of Orthodox rabbis have acted to counter the passivity of the rabbinate in this matter.

A handful of rabbis led by Emmanuel Rackman, a leading modern Orthodox authority, recently created a new religious court, or beit din, which thus far has freed six women by finding ways within Jewish law to annul their marriages.

Speaker after speaker said Jewish law could be interpreted to allow Orthodox women a more active role in their religious lives.

"Where there is a rabbinic will, there is a halachic way," Greenberg said in her opening remarks, reiterating a phrase she has long used. "Part of our task is to generate that halachic will."

Some centrist Orthodox rabbinical authorities are firmly opposed to the changes.

Describing the changes Orthodox women are making as "frivolous and culturally schismatic," Rabbi J. David Bleich, a well-known interpreter of Jewish law and dean of Yeshiva University, said change can come only at the impetus of the rabbinate, not from outside.

"Changing the norms is up to the rabbinate alone," said Rabbi Bleich in an interview. He did not attend the conference.

"Is medicine up to anyone but the medical profession? Is law up to anyone but a jurist?" he asked.

"You can't change the norms and still claim to be operating within a traditional community. If they do, then they are beyond the pale of Orthodoxy," said Bleich. "It's called Conservatism."

Blu Greenberg

One of the handful of pulpit rabbis who attended the conference disagreed with Rabbi Bleich.

"There are sources within traditional Judaism" that permit women an expanded role, but "they're not mainstream," said Rabbi Abraham Mandelbaum, spiritual leader of Congregation Ahavat Yisrael in Hewlett, N.Y.

"We have to find solitary ideas and develop them more fully to make them mainstream," he said.

"We are not here as rebels, but because people are sincere in their search for God. What could be wrong with that?"

The question of women becoming Orthodox rabbis hung in the air throughout the conference. The Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist movements all ordain women.

A consensus seemed to emerge from many of the speakers that the term "rabbi" would not be the label used and that new terms must be developed. At the same time, however, women are already beginning to work in all of the roles filled by an Orthodox rabbi except as ritual leaders of public worship.

The entire phenomenon of women assuming positions of Orthodox religious leadership is rooted in education.

Knowledge is power, speakers said, and Orthodox women today have received better Jewish educations than their foremothers did.

Now that feminist Orthodox women have gained the confidence of knowing firsthand the positions taken by Jewish history's great rabbinic authorities, they have begun to question the way some contemporary rabbis are interpreting them.

"Words like 'power' and 'authority' feel comfortable in" the mouths of Orthodox women today, Greenberg said in her opening speech.

Pam Ehrenkranz Zur, who came from Stamford, Conn., and is the mother of three young girls, said education continues to bring changes to the perspectives of girls today.

She said she and her peers did not get to that point as girls, but "our daughters are asking, 'Why can't I do that?'"

USDS Bayview rules school hockey tournament

Second time winners of event named for Yitzhak Rabin

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the second year in a row, USDS Bayview rules the day school hockey world following a not unexpected victory in a four-team hockey tournament.

USDS Bayview didn't overwhelm the opposition as they did the year before, but they were good enough to win the second annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament. They defeated a team from Bialik 6-2 in the championship game, after Bialik kept the game close for two periods.

Robert Samery, one of the parents who organized the tournament, said Bialik netminder Aaron Shapiro came up with an outstanding performance to keep his team in the game. Bayview, with six AAA players on the roster, were tough to beat. Bialik, with two AA players, gave them a run for the money while USDS Bathurst had one AAA player in their lineup. The fourth team in the tournament was USDS Richmond Hill.

As was the case last year, the one-day tournament was held at Forest Hill Arena and it attracted an estimated 300 onlookers, including family, friends and schoolmates.

The teams played a round robin format followed by a playoff game and the championship matchup.Three girls (two on Bialik, one on USDS Richmond Hill) and dozens of boys between the ages of nine and 12 made up the teams.

Samery said the tournament succeeded in creating a sense of "cohesiveness in the day school environment and allowed the kids to join together on their PD day."

Everyone received a trophy at the end of the day and the kids enjoyed a lavish lunch with bagels, muffins and "tons of food," Samery said. In addition, Corey Mandell provided musical accompaniment at faceoffs and announced goals over the loudspeaker system, keeping the event "upbeat." Stuart Davison conducted a power skating lesson for kids who weren't on the teams, he added.

The tournament also raised $300 for the United Jewish Appeal.

Although the event doesn't currently have the sanction of the schools, the parent organizers are hoping to convince school administrators to one day approve a day school hockey league.

Rabbi Irwin Witty, director of the Board of Jewish Education, said "we look on the tournament very favorably. It encourages youngsters, it gives schools spirit, it's named for the late prime minister and it teaches sportsmanship," he said. "This is a beautiful way for children to interact."

Pauline Clein, principal at USDS Bayview, said the school supports the annual tournament but that the school cannot take over running a hockey league. The games and practices would not be on school property and would more appropriately be organized by the parents, she said.

Golden Horseshoe competition

While they don't have a league of their own, the kids still get to play plenty of hockey. Their parents arrange matches with teams from other private and public schools throughout the winter. Those games re usually held at either 7 a.m. or 4:30 p.m. so as not to interfere with school but lunchtime games would be the most convenient, Samery said.

USDS Bayview dominates those matchups as well, while the other teams hold their own, he added.

Participants at the Yitzhak Rabin competition have been invited to a tournament on April 13, sponsored by the Hamilton Jewish Community Centre (JCC). There, the kids will be mixed and matched with players from Hamilton, St. Catharines, Dundas, Burlington and other centres, Samery said.

Dubbed The Golden Horseshoe Hockey Tournament, the event is entering its third year. It's designed to bring together children from surrounding communities. "It's not a competitive tournament, it's more of a social one," said Michele Schneider, a spokesperson for the Hamilton JCC.

Last year, 60 kids ages eight to 14 participated. They're put together in four teams in two age groups and they play two games each. Afterwards, they return to the Hamilton JCC for a barbecue, she said.

The tournament was initiated thanks to the Berman family of Dundas, Schneider added.

Detroit man accused of spying for Israel

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A decade after Jonathan Pollard was sentenced to life in prison for spying for Israel, a new FBI investigation into the activities of another American Jew has hit a raw nerve among Israeli and Jewish officials.

Federal officials recently searched the home of army engineer David Tenenbaum, a 39-year-old Detroit-area Jewish resident, after he said that he had inadvertently shared classified documents with Israeli military officials.

Israeli officials here were quick to say that this case is different from that of Pollard, the former navy analyst whose case rocked U.S.-Israeli relations and whose life sentence became a cause celebre in the American Jewish community.

Israeli officials, who said there has been no official contact with the United States on the matter, warned that Israeli personnel stationed in the United States should only accept classified information through official channels.

According to an affidavit filed by the FBI at the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, "Tenenbaum admitted to divulging non-releasable classified information to every Israeli Liaison Officer (ILO) assigned to the U.S. Army Tank Automotive and Armaments Command (TACOM) over the last 10 years."

Tenenbaum worked at TACOM, located north of Detroit, which designs and maintains the fleet of vehicles for the U.S. Army.

After a routine polygraph test he took as part of a security-clearance upgrade, Tenenbaum told investigators that he gave classified information on Patriot missiles countermeasures, Bradley tanks and various U.S. Army vehicles to Israelis assigned to work with the U.S. Army.

Specifically, Tenenbaum told investigators, he gave classified information to Dr. Reuven Granot, scientific deputy director of the Israeli Ministry of Defence, according to the affidavit.

Jewish organizational officials, unaware of the investigation until informed by a reporter, expressed concern and caution.

"It's a disturbing story. We're waiting to hear the details," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

"We can't jump to any conclusions," he added. "No Israeli authority has been approached by the U.S. government on this issue," said Gadi Baltiansky, press spokesman at the Israeli Embassy in Washington.

At the same time, Baltiansky pledged "full cooperation on the matter" if the United States seeks Israeli assistance.

"Israeli defence personnel serving in the United States are given the most clear and categorical instructions forbidding them from receiving classified information except through the official channels established between the two countries," Baltiansky said.

The FBI has not filed any criminal charges in the case.

The affidavit, necessary to obtain a search warrant, said Tenenbaum could be charged with gathering and transmitting defence information, gathering and delivering information to aid a foreign government and disclosing classified information.

These federal charges carry a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $25,000 fine. No one answered the phone at Tenenbaum's home in the Detroit suburbs.

Wilbert Simkovitz, a retired engineer from TACOM, told the Detroit Jewish News, "We get intelligence from the Israelis, too. It's not a one-way street,"

"If he did anything it was probably inadvertent," Simkovitz said of Tenenbaum.

Alfred Goldstein, also a retired engineer from TACOM, told the Detroit Jewish News that most of the work done at TACOM is not highly sensitive.

Goldstein, a mechanical engineer who said he did not know Tenenbaum, said there were three to five Israeli representatives at the tank command on a rotating basis.

FBI officials in Detroit would not say whether their search of Tenenbaum's home yielded any results. According to the affidavit, FBI agents were looking for documents and computer files related to classified material.

TIPSY CHICKEN
WE SELL KitchenAid FOR LESS

2-3 carrots, sliced
2 onions, sliced
6 lbs. chicken, with most of the skin removed, cut up into 10-12 pieces salt, pepper, paprika to taste
1/4 cup peach schnapps
1/4 cup orange marmalade
1/2 cup orange juice
1 tblsp. soy sauce

Line bottom of roasting pan with sliced carrots and onions. Place chicken pieces in single row. Sprinkle with salt, pepper, and paprika. In saucepan, heat schnapps, marmalade, orange juice, and soy sauce for 1 minute or until bubbles form. Pour sauce over chicken and roast 60-75 minutes at 375°F. Baste after 30 minutes. Yield: 6-8 servings.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am scheduled for cataract surgery at the end of the month. Even though it's not serious, I am very frightened because I have no one to help me when I come home. I am 89 years old and arthritic so how can I put drops in my eyes? Please tell me what I can do.

LJ

Dear LJ,

Call the hospital ophthalmology department and speak to the discharge planning nurse. Tell her about your situation. Arrangements can be made to help you, but you must tell the staff that you have this problem. There should be follow-up help available to you. However, if you need private help, you can prearrange care from a home care agency. You will feel relieved knowing that someone will be there for you.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

IDF pullbacks on agenda

Mideast leaders on the road selling their cause

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
and JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel will not press the so-called "reciprocity" issue with the Palestinian Authority (PA) as a condition for the planned IDF pullback in the territories, officials said last weekend.

It will instead focus on possible Palestinian tacit acquiescence to the construction of Har Choma,

Given the scope of Arab and international condemnation, the officials made clear that Har Choma looms larger for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at this point than the other issues that were reaffirmed as a follow-up to the Hebron pullback deal.

Among those issues, which have loosely been called "reciprocity" issues, are revising the Palestinian National Charter, reducing the size of the Palestinian forces, confiscation of illegal firearms from Hamas and extradition of suspects.

Trade mission wraps up

By EDGAR ASHER
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Canadian International Trade Minister Art Eggleton last week concluded a trade mission here of 60 people including some of Canada's leading industrialists and business people, representing 49 companies.

The visit was a direct result of implementation of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) which came into effect on Jan. 1.

Although the minister paid a short courtesy call on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Eggleton's main activity was directed to trade related meetings as well as the signing of several bilateral agreements that further the commercial development between the two countries.

"There is a lot more to be accomplished between our two countries," said Israel's Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky at a lunch he hosted for Eggleton and his delegation. "Although trade is well-balanced between Israel and Canada, it is only a beginning. In 1995, two-way trade exceeded $450 million (Can). We expect trade figures for 1996 to be very much higher. CIFTA is a powerful tool to build commercial bridges between Canada and Israel."

Sharansky told his audience that the agreement he signed on behalf of Israel on July 31 last year in Toronto was the first agreement that he had signed since becoming a minister in the present government.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Federation Gets Grant

TORONTO — UJA Federation will soon receive a grant of 300,000 Deutschmarks (DM) (approximately $245,000 Canadian) from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany to help expand services for Holocaust survivors and hospice patients.

Since 1951, the Conference, which represents 23 major Jewish organizations, has been compensating Holocaust survivors, on behalf of the German government, for losses or damages suffered during the war.

The conference has allocated DM 55,000 (approximately $45,000) a year for the next three years to Senior Care for the expansion of home care to Holocaust survivors and DM 45,000 (approximately $37,000) for the Jewish Hospice program, which assists the dying and their families.

ISRAEL

New Sefer Torah

JERUSALEM — A new sefer Torah is currently being written by sponsors in both America and Israel in the name of the matriarch Rachel, for use by the Yeshivah of Rachel's Tomb, Bethlehem, Israel. Following on the heels of a commencement ceremony for the Torah, which was held in New York, a twinning ceremony in honor of the endeavor will be held on Saturday, March 8, at 8:30 p.m., in the Israel Centre, 10 Strauss St., Jerusalem.

Israel, Yemen Discuss Ties

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Yemeni officials are discussing opening interest offices in each other's countries as a first step toward establishing official ties.

WORLD

Rabbi Faces Jail Term

SAN FRANCISCO — The California rabbi accused of sexually molesting a bat mitzvah student has pleaded no contest to the charges and faces up to eight years in prison.

Rabbi Sidney Goldenberg, formerly of Petaluma's Congregation B'nai Israel, last week entered his plea at Santa Rosa Municipal Court in response to a charge of lewd and lascivious conduct with a minor younger than 14.

The sexual misconduct took place over several months late last year while Goldenberg was tutoring a 12-year-old girl for her bat mitzvah, officials said.

Anti-Semitic Incidents

WASHINGTON — The number of anti-Semitic incidents reported in the United States has declined for the second straight year, according to the Anti-Defamation League's (ADL) annual audit.

In 1996, 1,722 incidents were reported to the ADL — 121 fewer than in 1995, signifying a seven percent drop.

Yeshiva U Rep in Toronto

NEW YORK – Dr. Anita Rotman of Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work will be in Toronto from March 25 to April 4 to meet with individuals interested in learning about the school's Block Education Plan and other programs.

Individuals interested in meeting with Rotman can call 1-914-254-6215 or 1-212-960-0804 before March 21 or on the date of her arrival at the Park Plaza Hotel.

BRUSSELS — The European Union has signed a trade and cooperation accord with the Palestinian Authority.

Under the accord, the Palestinians are recognized as full partners of the European Union.

SS Pensions

BONN — The German government will stop paying pensions March 1 to some suspected war criminals who live outside Germany.

But World War II Nazis who now reside in Germany will continue to receive the supplementary "victim pensions," pending the reform of the 1950 law that made the payments possible in the first place.

The revelations have angered Jewish officials around the world.

FATAH MURDERS SPARK HEAVY REPRISAL

The heaviest outbreak of fighting in a decade occurred last week along the Lebanese border as Israeli armed forces smashed into Fatah strongholds in the hilly country of southeastern Lebanon. On four successive days, Israeli jets, artillery and troops in batallion strength, struck terrorists' concentrations on the Lebanese side of the border.

The attack was in retaliation for the murder of an Israeli couple, Albert and Florence Malka, parents of three, who were killed by a bazooka shell fired as they were returning home from a bar mitzvah celebration in Nahariya.

MONTREAL Y REVERSES STAND ON PLAY

The Man in the Glass Booth at the Saidye Bronfman Centre has been called to a halt just days before the premier performance. The board of directors of the Y decided to stop the production of the Shaw play after it was swamped with hundreds of protest letters.

According to a press release, the play is a "disturbingly provocative drama" about a Jew playing the role of an SS colonel who "brings into focus the receding memory of history's cruelest genocide and expiates his own feelings of guilt at having survived."

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Arab journalist rejects anti-Semitic articles

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I don't want you to believe there is only one side, [publishing] anti-Semitic articles," said the voice at the other end of the line. There are many Arabs, particularly better educated ones, who believe in the peace process and who reject articles that attack Jews.

Speaking with great passion and a sense of conviction, Hussain Al-Hilli took pains to distance the majority of the Arab community from articles that have been published by Al-Miraat (The Mirror) newspaper. "Not only me, but they reject this kind of writing," Al-Hilli said.

A freelance journalist who writes for El Ressala (The Message) and El Raie (The Opinion), Al-Hilli said he has long opposed the editorial policy of Al-Miraat. He has broken away from the paper and no longer writes for it. But when he saw The CJN's Jan. 16 article on anti-Semitic articles in the Canadian Arab press, he said he felt obliged to call and tell another side of the story.

The CJN article pointed out that an Oct. 9, 1996 article in Al-Miraat on the opening of the Jerusalem tunnel stated: "You won't be safe near the Jews" and "history has taught us that you cannot trust their side."

A poem published on May 15, 1996 compared Israelis to Nazis.

"The more educated Iraqis disagree with Al-Miraat," Al-Hilli said. Their concern is Saddam Hussein, who continues to butcher the Iraqi people.

"For any Iraqi, the problem is the regime," not the Jews or Israel. "We escaped from Mideast regimes that tried to brainwash us" and now we are facing similar false stories in the media, he said.

Al-Hilli said he has written often in support of the Mideast peace process and last year he criticized as "un-Islamic" the bus bombings in Tel Aviv that killed dozens of innocent civilians. That stance prompted angry readers to fax threats to the Arab-language newspaper that carried his article, he said.

Al-Hilli suggested there is a constituency for the sort of anti-Jewish article contained in Al-Miraat, primarily immigrants who have arrived recently from Syria, Lebanon and Iraq. "There are ignorant people still poisoned by past ideas," he said.

Unlike them, Al-Hilli is fascinated by the Jewish contribution to Iraq. He pointed to their uninterrupted presence in the country since biblical times. The first modern Iraqi poet was Jewish and most of the winners of an Israeli government prize for Arab literature are Iraqi Jews, he said.

So fascinated is Al Hilli with the Jewish history of Iraq, he is currently working on a book on the community.

We have entered an era of peace, Al-Hilli said. "You must not allow people to use freedom of speech to bring back old ghosts."

Quebecers want to remain in Canada: Gazette publisher

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – A clear majority of Quebecers want their province to remain part of Canada says the president and publisher of the Gazette, Montreal's only English language daily newspaper.

"I believe that Quebecers just want a reason to say yes for staying in the country," Michael Goldbloom said at a recent panel sponsored by New Leadership State of Israel Bonds. Other panel members were Marcel Coté, economist and co-founder of SECOR Consulting; and Robert Vineberg, senior partner in the law firm of Goodman Phillips & Vineberg and immediate past chair, Combined Jewish Appeal.

Goldbloom said, however, he is not confident that the country can achieve reconciliation without some constitutional initiative.

"Recognizing Quebec as unique would not have changed the equilibrium of the country. The [irony] of the situation is that it is only the English who speak of separation. The Quebec government is interested in getting its economic house in order," he said.

Coté said that to understand Montreal and Quebec, one must understand the power of language. "The Québécois fear losing their language and they feel a need to protect it. They talk about the unique, fundamental characteristic that makes Quebec distinct. Language is a definer of society and that is a view that is hard to understand in English Canada."

Language, he said, defines "who you know, who are your friends, your business partners, and who will influence you...[It also] has influence on one's attitudes and beliefs — who do I trust and who do I side with?

"It is the key factor that defines collectivity and people who share a language tend to move like a school of fish. In most countries this is a 'people,' but in Canada it is more complicated."

With regards to the Jewish community in Quebec, Vineberg said that Jews grew up in the province as a double minority — religiously and linguistically. "They had no real hope of being accepted into the majority and they turned their efforts to establishing themselves and educating their children.

"The world has changed, yet it still recognizes that it is part of a double minority. The result has been that it has established a unique community with enormously high rates of involvement."

Jews in Quebec have a high percentage of students in Hebrew day schools and have a low rate of intermarriage, Vineberg said. "There is a deep-seated pride in what we have achieved. We have flourished because of adversity; we had to study harder to achieve more."

He conceded that Quebec nationalism does hurt the Jewish community, "but the community has built a strong character and it has the desire to survive and continue to prosper. Those that remain in the community are prepared to invest money and time to make sure that [the community] remains vibrant and strong."

Asked what money raised by Combined Jewish Appeal can do for young Montreal Jews, Vineberg described one of its programs that matches college graduates with jobs. "We recognize that jobs are the key. Young people will leave if they cannot find jobs."

A second program, said Vineberg, will teach skills and provide mentoring to college graduates as well as those in their 30s an 40s who want to go into their own business. "We have to do more to get people into the workforce."

Quebec hypocritical, self-serving on referenda issue

A number of interesting developments in the national political discourse caught my eye last week. I offer the following observations on two of them.

Legal argument started last week in the Supreme Court in Ottawa to determine the constitutional rules that would apply in the event of Quebec's separation from Canada.

Ottawa contends that there must be a legal framework for separation within current Canadian law, and that the Constitution is sufficiently flexible to accommodate such a framework.

A unilateral decision by Quebec to separate, Ottawa maintains, is tantamount to anarchy. Such a decision is illegal under both Canadian and international law.

The government of Quebec, not surprisingly, takes a contrary view. It also refuses to participate in the proceedings.

Premier Lucien Bouchard was reported in the Globe and Mail to have said: "It is not for the Supreme Court to decide anything that goes against the will of the Quebec people."

It is the position of the Bouchard government that separation is Quebec's democratic right.

As our readers are aware, The CJN wholeheartedly supports the position of the federal government on the matter of Quebec separation.

It is the only position which, in a true and deep way, respects the sanctity of the overarching values of democracy.

So overwhelmingly important an act such as separation will affect not only Quebecers. It will affect all Canadians from coast to coast. Therefore it must be taken in accordance with law, in accordance with rules, in accordance with the traditions and the conventions that have governed the federation till now.

Nothing in this vital constitutional debate is more important than that it be carried out within and as an affirmation of the rule of law. Thus, the position of the Quebec government in spurning it altogether cannot be condoned.

Democratic rights

But there is an additional aspect of Quebec's position which warrants comment. Bouchard's constant resort to Quebec's "democratic right" as the sole, sufficient justification for separation is hypocritical, sanctimoniously self-serving and inconsistent.

It is hypocritical because it is not truly respected or honored. The majority of the people of Quebec have already twice rejected separation. Yet, the premier and his party treat those results as if they were nothing more than nuisances or temporary red aberrations along an inevitably blue horizon.

True respect for "democratic rights" would require the government to adopt a meaningfully representative political agenda on behalf of all Quebec citizens, including the majority which has twice demonstrated its preference that Quebec remain in Canada.

The constant resort to "democratic rights" is sanctimoniously self-serving because it does not apply in both directions, namely for federalists as it does for separatists.

Bouchard has often stated, as did his predecessor, that even the slimmest majority of one would suffice to start the machinery of separation rolling.

And yet, the opposite does not hold. Both a substantial and a slim majority against separation have not been enough to scrap the machinery of separation.

If separatists win the next referendum by a slight margin, will Bouchard allow an other vote on the subject in the next term of the government?

Will he allow vote after vote to be held until the federalist majority is restored?

In other words,will he confer upon the federalist citizens of Quebec the same "democratic rights" that he confers upon the separatist citizens of Quebec?

Finally, the "democratic right" justification is also inconsistent because it says for the separatist citizens of Quebec, a referendum on separation is a binding exercise recognizable under international law while for the federalist citizens of the province, a referendum is merely a consultation.

Earlier in the week, Bouchard publicly expressed his anger to Premier Mike Harris over the possibility that the government of Ontario might close Montfort Hospital in Ottawa, the only major French-language hospital in Ontario.

We agree that the government of Ontario would be wrong to close the hospital. French-language health care services should be maintained at Montfort.

But once again, we are less bemused by Bouchard's hypocrisy than we are saddened by it.

Just over one month ago, he actively supported a unanimous motion by the Parti Québécois (PQ) to have the Office de la langue française in Quebec review the need to provide health services in the English language.

At the time, The CJN referred to the PQ's decision as "a heartless and vindictive policy...unnecessarily preying upon and sharpening the fears of the anglophone minority, especially the elderly and the frail."

We believe that still to be the case, even as it would be in the event of the closure of Montfort Hospital.

The concern by Bouchard for the rights of the francophone minority in Ontario is laudable. So too would be an equal concern, were he to demonstrate one, for the anglophone minority in Quebec.

"There are only a few weeks left to this year's RRSP deadline. Do you have a financial plan? Do you need help evaluating where to invest your money?"

"Remember, just one idea could change your entire financial future ... have you explored all your options?"

Government names more alleged Nazi war criminals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The list of alleged Nazi war criminals facing deportation has grown to nine as federal authorities announced the names of two more suspects last week.

Toronto resident Peteris Vitols and Serge Kisluk of St. Catharines will face court proceedings to strip them of their citizenship. Federal authorities allege the men lied about their wartime activities when they obtained Canadian citizenship.

Documents filed in Federal Court claim Kisluk, 74, failed to divulge to Citizenship and Immigration officials his wartime collaboration with Nazi authorities in Ukraine from 1941-43.

Kisluk, Vitols face deportation

They claim he served "as a member of the German armed forces and as a member of the Ukrainian auxiliary police (Schtuzmannschaften) in the Turiysk Raion, Kovel District, General Commissariat Volyn-Podolia, a local auxiliary police under the command of the Germans."

The documents also allege he participated "as a member of the German armed forces and of the Ukrainian auxiliary police, in the commission of crimes and atrocities against members of the civilian population in Ukraine."

The second man, Vitols, 81, is alleged to have collaborated "with the occupying German authorities as a member of the Madona District Police in German occupied Latvia." It's also alleged he served in the 281st Schutzmannschaft Battalion (Schuma 281) during that time, was a member of the Waffen SS and was associated "with organizations actively engaged in atrocities against the civilian population."

Vitols' lawyer, Donald Powell, who is also his son-in-law, has mounted a legal and public relations campaign to convince Justice Minister Allan Rock to stay the proceedings. He said government lawyers have backtracked from allegations made a year ago, in which they claimed he "participated in atrocities against the civilian population."

The later set of allegations claim he was merely associated with organizations that perpetrated atrocities, Powell said. The government case is flimsy and confused because it relied on a discredited Soviet-produced book, Powell added.

Kisluk and Vitols bring to 10 the number of men named as alleged war criminals. One of the 10, Antanas Kenstavicius, died recently on the first day of his hearing. Federal officials have said they will name 12 suspects by the end of March.

Canadian Jewish Congress commended the government for bringing the two most recent cases forward.

"I would only wish the government would name the other two tomorrow," said Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber. "Even a month delay is too long."

Farber said Congress has known about Kisluk since 1981 when it forwarded information about him to legal authorities. "It's somewhat disappointing that it took 16 years to deal with this case," he said.

Scientists to examine Judaism

TORONTO – The Association of Orthodox Jewish Scientists, Hillel International and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto are sponsoring a Shabbaton entitled Torah and Science: Building Bridges.

The program will take place on March 7 and 8, at the Shomrai Shabbos Synagogue, 585 Glengrove Ave.

The Shabbaton will explore the relationship between science and the Jewish tradition. Also it will offer students ther personal perspective of Jewish scientists, doctors, and engineers as how they reconcile Judaism with their personal lives.

The participants will examine to what role does science play in Judaism and what can Judaism offer to science.

The speakers include Dr. Janice Halpern, Rabbi Mark Dratch, Professor David Novack, Dr. Aryeh Gotfryd, Yitzhak Kurtz and Reuven Gellman.

Peel school board dismisses Fromm as teacher

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Controversial teacher Paul Fromm may soon be looking for a new job.

The board of trustees of the Peel Region Board of Education last week approved the senior administration's recommendation that Fromm be dismissed as an adult education teacher. Fromm has been suspended without pay and his teaching contract will be terminated on Aug. 31.

Fromm has said he will file a grievance in a bid to set aside the board's decision.

In dismissing Fromm, the board noted that he disregarded a 1993 warning against participating in programs organized by white supremacists.

"As a teacher, Fromm's conduct must be perceived to uphold the values and beliefs which are fundamental to the education system and the Peel Board of Education — including multiculturalism and ethnocultural equity. Fromm's remarks and activities have demonstrated a profound disrespect for these principles," said Janet McDougald, vice-chair of the board.

Fromm landed in hot water after B'nai Brith Canada produced a videotape and other evidence suggesting Fromm had violated the board's ethnocultural policy and he ignored the 1993 caution. The evidence showed he participated in a 1994 memorial symposium for U.S. white supremacist Revilio Oliver, which was sponsored by the National Alliance, a racist group in the United States. In addition, B'nai Brith pointed out that Fromm spoke at a March 1996 conference in Vancouver organized by extremists.

"We commend the Peel Board for having the courage to stand up for their convictions...Paul Fromm will no longer be working for the Peel Board of Education because all students, including adults, deserve a learning environment that is inclusive and free from prejudice and bias. They are to be applauded for their precedent-setting decision," said Rochelle Wilner, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Karen Mock, national director of the League, said a coalition of groups had advocated Fromm's dismissal. Clergy representing several Christian denominations had urged his removal, as did the B'nai Brith lodge in Halton Peel and the Peel Multicultural Council.

"This case shows the importance of effective networking among community groups," Mock said. "We were assisted in launching our complaint and gathering evidence by Alan Dutton, David Lethbridge and several members of B'nai Brith lodges in British Columbia and the Halton/Peel lodge, Har Tikvah and Solel Congregations," she added.

Fromm, founder of the Canadian Association for Free Expression, told the Toronto Star the board's decision will have a far-reaching impact. "It isn't just me. Any teacher who makes any political statement that someone might disagree with will leave that person open to dismissal," he said.

The 1993 warning to Fromm came after Canadian Jewish Congress and the Native Canadian Centre (NCC) complained about his associations with racist groups and his remark of "scalp 'em" during a 1991 presentation by an NCC spokesman to the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Race Relations.

Indirect responsibility

A report circulated last week indicated that more than 1,500 people in Ontario were on a waiting list for heart surgery and that as many as 55 people may have died from their cardio-vascular conditions for lack of timely medical intervention.

The news passed relatively unheralded from one day to the next, simply one more item on a lengthy, daily list of expected unpleasant items.

If the report of these deaths was true, then we as a society, and especially the people who purport to be our leaders, must stand before the mirror of conscience and re-examine, re-evaluate and redirect our priorities.

The death of these individuals should have shaken us to our souls. But there was no public outcry. God spare us if the report of so preventable a human loss now leaves us unmoved. If the report was true, there could have been no greater proof of our society's failure to care for our fellow human beings. And no failure would deserve greater condemnation.

The CJN recently noted that in biblical times, when an unknown person was found dead in a field outside the city perimeters, the leaders of the community nearest to where the body was discovered were compelled to publicly proclaim "Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it." (Deuteronomy 21)

Nechama Leibowitz, the venerated biblical scholar, has observed that the "concept of bloodshed was interpreted in a very broad manner to include even indirect responsibility for the death of a human being through neglect to attend to his elementary needs. The public as a whole and the community nearest to the slain and its elders are all responsible for the terrible deed committed in the field. Their whole way of life, their social order, economic, educational and security institutions are answerable..."

We urge our federal and our provincial leaders to re-examine our political priorities. The concern for heightened fiscal responsibility must never, ever countenance so egregious a societal failure as that which may be occurring today in our health care, and indeed, in other fields of care.

As we have written regarding social welfare policies, "there is no ambiguity; the obligation to help those who are in need is uncompromising. It is incumbent upon us all. It is the moral, the just and the proper way to behave."

Can we as a society, in full conscience, say that we bear no indirect responsibility for the reported deaths of those approximately 55 human beings through our failure to attend to their elementary needs? Can our leaders, in full conscience, say "our hands have not shed this blood?"

Words and promises

Last weekend, Yasser Arafat reportedly told the Arab League meeting in Cairo that Israel's intention to build homes on Har Choma was "an attempt to blast to smithereens the peace process."

Last month at Erez checkpoint in Gaza, when he signed the Hebron redeployment agreement, he reaffirmed his commitment to "fighting terror and preventing violence" by, among other things, "preventing incitement and hostile propaganda."

How can Arafat's words in Cairo be reconciled with his promise in Erez? They cannot be.

Feeling proud about Aliyah

I recently returned to Israel for my third trip and I am amazed at the changes that have occurred. My first trip was in 1976 when there were only three million people; at the time of my second trip in 1990, there were less than five million people; and now, on my most recent trip in 1997, I was told there are close to six million people. My most lasting impression this time were of the new immigrants.

Very close to the arrival area for El Al passengers to Tel Aviv was the arrival area for new immigrants from the former Soviet Union. While I waited for my luggage, I sat there and observed some of the new immigrants. These particular Jewish immigrants were arriving from a Muslim region. They looked undernourished and were a dentist's nightmare. Although I could see the trepidation on the adults' faces, the children played games, oblivious to the dramatic change taking place in their life. All Diaspora Jews who helped fund this massive immigration should be very proud.

Canadians want equal treatment

I have the deepest respect and appreciation for the efforts made by the Jewish Vocational Service (JVS), as well as by all of our community, to provide employment, especially in these difficult times.

I was distressed to see an article saying that the JVS had invited all recent immigrants of under three years residency in Canada to participate in a blitz to find jobs. As well, only "recent graduates" are permitted to use The CJN's free Jobs Wanted column (Montreal edition only). What about the rest of us?

I am a Canadian-born Quebecer, a community-oriented person in the 30 to 65-year-old range, not a full graduate, but very experienced, as are thousands of our own co-religionists. Why is not the effort made to give us priority or at least equal treatment? This is not without disrespect for the immigrants. I love and respect them. They are essential to our community.

We, too, want to renew our lives and need good jobs, not leftovers. This type of treatment results in depression, ruined lives and exits from our shrinking, beautiful Montreal.

Kehilah not the key to Peretz

In his review of Ruth Wisse's new anthology of I.L. Peretz, Rabbi Baskin writes: "For 25 years Peretz served as an official of the Jewish community of Warsaw giving untiringly of himself as a prolific writer, publisher, teacher and dramatist."

As I read this, and I could be wrong in my reading, Rabbi Baskin is somehow relating Peretz' public persona, his literary and public writings with his post in the gmina, the Warsaw kehilah.

Not so. The job with the kehilah was just that, a job that gave him livelihood. It had mainly to do with records, vital statistics, the cemetery. In one sense it was indirectly related. It freed him to act as litterateur in his spare time. He was a lawyer, but his licence to practise had been removed under suspicion of revolutionary activity.

The end of timidity and silence

The amazing success of the World Jewish Congress, representing world Jewry, in putting pressure on the Swiss banking authorities to divulge the truth about billions in money, art, and jewelry, proves once again to the world, Am Yisrael chai.

Our parents, grandparents and past generations were convinced that timidity and silence was the way to deal with their lives, but this new leadership under president Edgar Bronfman, together with U.S. Senator D'Amato, and U.S. President Bill Clinton, and no doubt many other righteous thinking people, is the reason for Swiss banking officials finally admitting the truth — that there was money, art and other valuables entrusted to them. A drop-in-the-bucket fund of $70 million has been set up for the survivors.

Our present and future generations are being appealed to to carry on this new, and obviously productive diplomacy on any matters which may concern world Jewry.

Calgary spotted great teacher

That was a great article about "Dynamic Netivot teacher," but why no mention of Agi Romer Segal from Akiva Academy in Calgary?

It was Agi Romer Segal who nominated Ellie Gellman. Without her nomination, none of this greatness would have come to pass. Agi recognized Ellie's genius as a teacher and had the vision to nominate her some six years ago.

Observations on the mood in Quebec

Looking deeper into the recent FEDERATION CJA survey

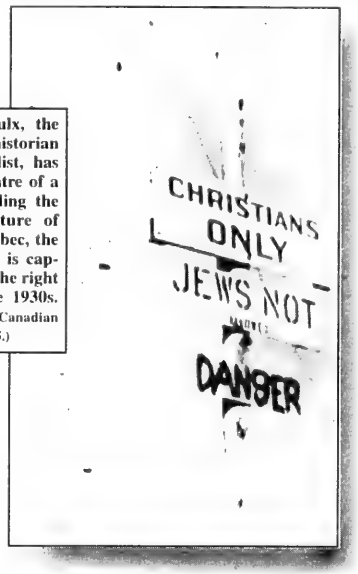
By JACK JEDWAB

For decades, Quebecers have been inundated with questionnaires and/or surveys attempting to gauge opinion on political matters and most notably on constitutional issues. Not a month goes by without the latest figures being released on how many Quebecers are either for or against federalism or sovereignty.

In the aftermath of the narrow referendum results of Oct. 30, 1995, even a slight increase or decrease in support of federalism seems to affect the ever-volatile mood of Quebecers. To satisfy their respective supporters, both federalist and separatist spin doctors make every effort to put their desired interpretation on the results of surveys on the constitutional future. But the anxiety over the political situation is constant for many Quebecers.

Many Quebec analysts stress the differences in opinion on the constitutional future between Quebec's "divided" francophone population and the presumably monolithic non-francophone communities.

At times, this approach has led to sweeping generalizations about the attitudes of the province's ethnic and linguistic minorities. Caution certainly needs to be exercised when assessing the opinions of subgroups, in this case minority communities within the Quebec population.



Lionel-Adolphe Groulx, the controversial priest, historian and fervent nationalist, has recently been the centre of a public debate regarding the origins and the nature of anti-Semitism in Quebec, the ugliest face of which is captured in the signs on the right from Monreal in the 1930s. (Photo from The Canadian Encyclopedia, Hurtig, 1985.)

In this regard, certain conclusions drawn from a recently released survey of Montreal's Jewish community conducted by FEDERATION CJA illustrate the need to situate some of the observations about the community within a broader context.

Over a year after the Quebec referendum, both The Canadian Jewish News (Dec. 12, 1996) and the Montreal Gazette highlighted the "record levels" of pessimism about life in Quebec reported by the Montreal Jewish community respondents in a survey which dealt with a broad range of issues. Almost two-thirds of respondents said they were "pessimistic" and about one-quarter were "very pessimistic" about life in Quebec. Nearly 80 percent viewed negatively the long-term political and economic outlook for the province and some 65 percent regarded the social outlook (whatever that means) as unfavorable.

Without diminishing the significance of these findings, it is useful to place them in a temporal context and to contrast them with the opinions of non-Jewish Quebecers. The CJN did indeed make reference to the 1991 FEDERATION CJA survey, noting that half the respondents were pessimistic about the economy and over two-thirds about the political situation. The increase over the five ensuing years is not surprising in the aftermath of the 1995 referendum results and the deterioration of economic conditions in the province.

But in surveys of public opinion among the broader Quebec population, francophone and non-francophone, a significant number of persons also continually expresses pessimism about the future political and economic prospects for the province. In short, such pessimism is by no means confined to the Montreal Jewish community.

Where there appears to be an important divergence with the attitudes of Quebec's French Catholic population in particular, is in the stated intention of non-francophones who say they intend to leave the province at some point in the future and particularly if Quebec were to separate. In the federation survey of Montreal Jews, slightly over one-quarter suggested they would leave Quebec over the next five years and another 23 percent stated they were unsure. It should be noted that these numbers are not much higher than those which appeared in the 1991 survey when the same question was asked.

While the results are an important indication of the mood of the Montreal Jewish community and certainly reflect a serious problem, the number of persons who actually leave is far smaller than those who say they will. This will likely be borne out with regard to the 1991 Jewish community respondents when the results of the 1996 census are released later this year.

Whether they expressed the intention to leave or not, all respondents were asked to identify the reasons which would contribute to a departure from Quebec. As reported in The CJN on Dec. 12, 1996, about 80 percent identified the political situation, 53 percent the economy and about one-third the language situation as "very important" considerations. As an aside, only 10 percent of Sephardim identified language as a factor.

As the questions were asked in so "open-ended" a fashion, it is likely that many Quebecers as well would probably have enumerated the political and economic considerations to an equally significant degree in identifying reasons for people to leave. On the basis of this survey then, it may be misleading to attribute a greater weight to one factor than another. Indeed, it is clear that most of those who cited economic considerations also agreed that political factors influenced people's decision to leave. It should be noted that in various public opinion polls, many Quebec politicians have tried to distinguish economic from political instability as the reason for possibly leaving. Such a distinction is, at the very least, problematic.

The leadership of the Montreal Jewish community, through FEDERATION CJA and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, has a responsibility to convey as accurately as possible the mood of the community both to Jews and to non-Jews in Quebec and in the rest of Canada. This is especially important with respect to the issue of perceived anti-Semitism in Quebec as measured in the FEDERATION CJA survey.

In this regard, it should be noted that The CJN erroneously reported that over three-quarters of respondents believed that there was "significant" anti-Semitism in Quebec. (Dec. 12, 1996) Upon closer reading, the 1996 FEDERATION CJA survey cannot support such an interpretation. In fact, the survey indicates that while 14.8 percent of Montreal Jews claim that there is a great deal of anti-Semitism, another 61 percent stated that there is "some" and not "significant" anti-Semitism in the province. It is imprudent to equate "some" with "significant" as is done in The CJN article. Indeed, one could argue it may be more appropriate to add the 24 percent of respondents who said there was little anti-Semitism to the 61 percent who said there was some anti-Semitism.

For a more complete idea on the current state of opinion among Montreal Jews on anti-Semitism in Quebec, it is useful to examine the other questions included in the survey. These include the finding that a slight majority of Montreal Jews does not believe that there is more anti-Semitism here than in the rest of Canada; that the prevalent feeling is that anti-Semitism has not increased in Quebec in recent years. Rather, a greater number of respondents believe that the level of anti-Semitism has stayed the same.

Whereas in 1991 some 61 percent of the sample believed that anti-Semitism had increased in recent years, in 1996 some 35 percent felt it had increased. In 1996, nearly 50 percent felt that anti-Semitism had either stayed the same (39 percent) or decreased (8.5 percent). These findings do not imply that people should be satisfied with the status quo regarding anti-Semitism either in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada. Clearly, the actual degree of anti-Semitism throughout the country remains far too high. Moreover, in Quebec during the year 1996, there have been some pernicious incidents of anti-Semitism from both marginal and mainstream figures. But it would be inappropriate to make sweeping generalizations about rampant anti-Semitism in Quebec, a view which the Montreal Jews surveyed by FEDERATION CJA do not appear to support.

On the basis of this survey, one should be extremely cautious about drawing any links between the issues of political and economic uncertainty and the degree of anti-Semitism. While some analysts have pointed to the historical relationship under such circumstances, the federation survey simply does not provide a strong foundation upon which to make such links.

Generally, the findings of this survey on such issues as political and economic instability are in line with the polling of the broader population, notably those who voted for federalism in the last referendum. The survey reinforces the overwhelming support among Montreal Jews for federalism. On the issue of expressed "intention" to leave, there are also similarities in polls conducted among non-francophones (although there are many francophones within the Jewish community) that indicate large numbers of other, non-Jewish persons who might also consider leaving.

Just as in 1991, the more recent findings point to continued serious challenges, not only for Quebec Jewish leadership, but for Quebec political leaders on the whole regarding these issues. It is unfortunate that for "partisan" reasons, too many Quebec politicians fail to acknowledge some of the realities expressed in this important survey. The leadership of the Montreal Jewish community will have to expand its efforts at coalition building and work even more closely with non-Jewish leadership to further explain, in a non-threatening manner, the consequences of our political situation to politicians and other decision-makers in the province.

Jack Jedwab is the executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region and teaches the course, Minorities in Quebec at McGill University.

Opinions

Media's view of Israel is slanted

The tragic helicopter crash last month was the worst military accident in Israel's history. Seventy-three soldiers died.

By Viva Press in Halifax

Much has been said about this crash. Or has it?

The Jewish press has had extensive coverage, but what about the mainstream press? Why, in Halifax, was the press coverage so minimal?

The TV news reported the crash the day it happened. The local papers reported the crash the day after it happened. The news stories covering it were buried in the inside pages.

And that was it. Unless one had access to the Israeli sites on the Internet, news of the event ended there.

I can guess why news from Israel may not feature prominently in the press in Halifax. Perhaps it's because not many Nova Scotians have ties with the Middle East, though that seems a little lame, since the Middle East is one of the hot spots for news.

Whatever the reasons for the lack of coverage of the Middle East, I can't make excuses for the weak coverage here of world news in general.

In my third-year journalism class at King's, there are 23 people. At least one-third of them admit they have no interest in world news. This is a little scary for me, since my classmates and I are the journalists of the future. Some of them have told me "far-away" news does not affect them. This doesn't make sense to me. We are a part of this world and decisions made far away can have an effect on us here in Canada.

Many people I know in Halifax did not know about the collision between the two helicopters in the north of Israel. Yet interestingly, most of them knew about the skirmish between the Jews and the Arabs in the Hebron market near the Avraham Avinu complex, when both sides pelted eggs, apples and oranges at one another.

My only explanation for such an incongruity of emphasis is that the Hebron incident received more coverage than the air crash. Now, my question is, why? Why would a food fight receive more coverage than the worst helicopter crash in a country's history? Was it because in the food-fight incident Israel was seen as the "bad guy?" Or, was there another reason?

I am part of a newsgroup that consists of Jewish student journalists in North America. A recent topic of debate was the media coverage Israel does or does not receive in the mainstream press. For the most part, the argument favored those who said good news from Israel isn't reported enough. I agree with this side of the dispute. Israel gets the spotlight in news, but only when Israel is seen as the bad guy.

One of the students who contributes to this Jewish student journalist newsgroup argued that Israel is not a perfect country and that Diaspora Jews should not disregard this fact. Among other things, he pointed out that Israel violates human rights. Still, despite his contentions, he said the mainstream press already gives Israel enough negative coverage. He was directing his comments to the Jewish press that must have more balanced reporting.

Israel is known for its freedom of press. You can say what you want, when you want, where you want, and the Israeli government will not try to stop you. This freedom of press is both a sore point with me and something of which I am very proud. It is why I am annoyed that a food fight that pitted Jews against Arabs got more coverage than a tragic disaster that left 73 dead. On the other hand, I wouldn't want this freedom of press stopped. It is important that people know what's going on.

Another reason why there is so much coverage on Israel is that reporters find it far easier to have free access to news there than in any other Middle Eastern country.

I guess what I'm asking, then, is for more mainstream press coverage of Israel, but that this coverage should deal with the positive aspects of Israeli events as much as it focuses on the negative aspects.

Slogans conceal a hateful message

A month dedicated to the learning of black history is currently being commemorated worldwide. In Montreal's Dawson College much debate over the fine line between freedom of expression and racism has emerged from this educational celebration.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

One event in particular, which was planned by the black student societies at Dawson, involved members of the Nation of Islam coming to the school to "educate" black students about their rich heritage. When that group's members arrived at Dawson, many Jewish students found themselves frustrated because of the Nation of Islam's poor record regarding racist sentiment and incitement. Jewish students, backed by the campus Hillel organization, began to protest their presence at the school.

This move upset the black student societies and sparked a fierce debate over truth, pride and freedom of expression versus racism. The debate, however, was completely out of place in the halls of Dawson considering the context in which it found itself.

"That's why you call yourself Mr. Reubenstein, Mr. Goldstein, Mr. Silverstein. Because you been stealing rubies, gold and silver all over the earth. That's why we can't even wear a bracelet or necklace without calling it Jewelry." This remark made on Nov. 29, 1993 by Khalid Abdul Muhammad, a leader of the Nation of Islam, is just one of a wide range of "compassionate" and "educational" quotes by members of the organization. Statements such as this are clearly and blatantly racist, leaving no room for any debate at all.

The burden of exposing the truth was left solely in the hands of the Jewish students and Hillel, for no other student group or administrative body had the courage to see truth or justice prevail. Members of Hillel were on their feet defending all the victims of the Nation of Islam's racial hatred, not just Jews, but whites, Christians, women, homosexuals and all those who oppose the views of the organization and its demagogic leader, Louis Farrakhan. Since Hillel was the only group to utter a word of protest against the hatemongers, the blame for ruining this activity in celebration of Black History Month fell uniquely on Hillel's head, adding fuel to the fire of racial rhetoric.

The Nation of Islam attempts to promote black pride by portraying blacks as the exclusive victims of racial intolerance. According to the Nation of Islam's doctrine, the racial intolerance experienced by black people for generations has come at the hands of practically all non-black people. In exalting their own race at the expense of others, the Nation of Islam claims to be working for the betterment of the black person's quality of life in America.

Racism is a threat to stability of any kind; however, racism of this kind is exceptionally dangerous. As the Nation of Islam disguises its wicked and hateful message behind slogans of pride and education, many followers are disillusioned and tend to overlook the significance of the hidden bigotry. This type of racism perpetrates the violent villification of many peoples, while those spreading the rhetoric often think they are acting in the best interest of their community.

Perhaps now, in celebration of Black History Month we can all learn something about the difference between promoting pride and spreading racism. Pride comes from one's history; it is a matter of heritage that is measured by evaluating the accomplishments and contributions of ones roots. Pride comes to those who are exalted by who they are, not through the anger over who they are not. Human beings are not each other's stepping stones for attaining loftiness. When one group of people truly advances in the world, the entire human race benefits and advances together. We all share the same world, and only by truly learning about the treasures of one's cultural accomplishments can any race effectively combat intolerance and bigotry targeted against them.

Hopefully the subsequent weeks of Black History Month, and the future, will be witness to an inspiration of pride and courage extending from the achievements of the heroes of black culture. That way Hillel can go back to promoting Jewish causes on campus, instead of defending all those who are not represented by the narrow views of the Nation of Islam, and the black student societies can flourish with success in advancing the state of black people today.

Although it is frightening that last year's Million Man March on Washington, which was organized by the Nation of Islam, was quite successful and it seems that Louis Farrakhan's popularity is on the rise, there is a piece of history that is somewhat relieving. On May 26, 1964, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said, "I have a dream," at the largest civil rights demonstration ever. Marching arm in arm with King that day was Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel. There is still hope; we must simply find the appropriate means to attain our dreams.

Rochester dialogue could be a model

Time was — some 70 years ago — when the joint appearance of a Christian clergyman and a rabbi made headline news. Any kind of dialogue between them was considered a major breakthrough.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It was usually the Jews who were eager to engage in such discussion, hoping for larger recognition by the Christian majority and for a frank acknowledgment of the historical inequities and injuries the Jews had over the centuries suffered at the hands of Christendom.

More of this happened after World War II when the revelations of Christian silence and even collusion in the Holocaust became apparent and caused church people to have greater contact with Jews. Dialogues began to flourish, but when the Six Day War came and Jews felt that they were once again standing all alone, the new inter-religious venture faded once again and for a while disappeared.

Now comes news out of Rochester, N.Y., that the contact between the two religions has been renewed in a remarkable way — although for the time being on a local basis only. Participants in a milestone agreement between the Rochester Board of Rabbis, the Jewish Community Federation of the City and the Roman Catholic Diocese were signed last year. Surprisingly little attention has been given to the matter, which came to my attention only recently.

The following are some of the recommended provisions of the agreement: to combat and to respond publicly to all forms of anti-Semitism, racism, anti-Catholicism and religious intolerance; to promote richer and more frequent communication that will serve to instruct, enlighten and heal; to initiate efforts to ensure appropriate and accurate curricula when teaching about each other's faith traditions; to explore areas in which resources or parallel services such as in family services might benefit both communities; to strive to enlighten and become more sensitive to each other in areas of particular concern, such as the link with the State of Israel for Jewish people and issues of the sacredness of human life for Catholics.

The agreement was fleshed out by policies to put it into effect. Signatories were representatives of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Nazareth College of Rochester and the Anti-Defamation League.

I welcome the agreement and I hope that it will spread to other communities as well. But even more important for me: we need such dialogue badly within the Jewish community. It makes me very sad that it is easier these days to talk with religious leaders of another religion than to talk with my opposite numbers in the Jewish community. I recall the talmudic judgment on internal strife. When the Romans were laying siege to Jerusalem in the year 70, the Jews might have had a chance of withstanding the onslaught. But, muses the Talmud, this did not come to pass and Jerusalem was destroyed because Jews were fighting each other rather than a common enemy. The Talmud calls it sin'at chinam, baseless hatred. Intimations of such destructive sentiments have surfaced in Israel, and we here do our best to imitate such self-destructive attitude and practices.

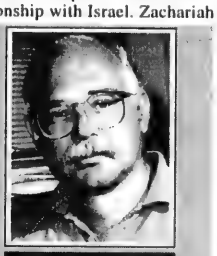
Canada's relationship with Israel examined

Only a handful of scholars have bothered to plumb the depths of Canada's relationship with Israel. Zachariah



By Sheldon Kirshner

Kay, a Canadian resident of Jerusalem, is one of the precious few who have risen to the challenge, not once but twice.

Nineteen years ago, he wrote Canada and Palestine: The Politics of Non-Commitment. Now he has written The Diplomacy of Prudence: Canada and Israel, 1948-1958, published by McGill-Queen's University Press recently.

Both books share a common theme, said Kay, a political scientist who made aliyah in the 1970s.

Judging by their titles, Canada has always exercised deliberate caution in its approach to Jewish nationalism and to Israel itself.

Canada was favorably disposed to a Jewish homeland in Palestine, but drew the line at a full-fledged Jewish state, explained Kay, who was in Toronto recently on the second leg of a Canadian lecture tour under the auspices of the Montreal-based Association of Canadian Studies. Once Israel came into being, Canada was cautious in its support of Israel, trying to strike a balanced position between Israel and its Arab adversaries.

In The Diplomacy of Prudence, the most ambitious treatment of Canadian foreign policy in the Mideast since David Bercuson's Canada and the Birth of Israel (1985), Kay fleshes out his thesis by examining Canada's response to several key issues: recognition of the new state, the status of Jerusalem, the Palestinian refugee problem, arms sales and the 1956 Suez war.

Israel had to wait more than seven months for Canadian de facto recognition and a further four months for de jure recognition, Kay points out. The delay stemmed in large part from Canada's reluctance to offend Britain, the former colonial power in Palestine.

Canada then permitted an Israeli diplomat, Avraham Harman, to take up residence in Ottawa as Israel's first consul general. In the interests of maintaining balance, Canada raised the status of Lebanon's representation and permitted Egypt to open a consulate general as well.

Canadian judiciousness was also reflected in matters concerning protocol. Canada did not raise the rank of Israel's official representative here to minister plenipotentiary-cum-ambassador until 1953. And the first non-resident Canadian ambassador to Israel, stationed in Greece, was not appointed until a year later. Four more years would elapse before Canada dispatched its first resident envoy, Margaret Meagher, to Tel Aviv.

According to Kay, Canada moved slowly in the exchange of diplomats with Israel out of domestic considerations. Canada had no formal relations with the Vatican at this juncture and was reluctant to irritate Canadian Catholics. Once this irritant was removed, Canada dealt with Israel on a reciprocal basis.

Canada's attitude toward Jerusalem was similarly dictated by compromise. Despite heavy Catholic pressure on Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent to line up behind the Vatican's stance for Jerusalem's total internationalization, Canada adopted a more pragmatic policy.

Canada accepted Israeli secular control over the western portion of the city, but, in consultation with Britain, did not recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

The Palestinian refugee issue, though not an impediment in Canada's links with Israel, remained a constant Canadian concern. Canada became the fourth largest contributor to the United Nations relief agency caring for the refugees and, in a modest gesture, admitted a number of English-speaking and French-speaking Palestinians from Jordan and Lebanon.

During the first decade of Israel's existence, Canada was a reluctant supplier of military equipment. Canada abided by the UN embargo on the shipment of arms to the Middle East. But in January 1949, after selling a batch of training aircraft to Egypt, Canada sold a smaller number of trainers to Israel. Subsequently, Canada let Israel buy 100 machine guns, 18 anti-aircraft units, about 18,000 rounds of ammunition and tank parts and tracks.

Canada, however, denied Israel's separate requests to buy Mosquito planes and F-86 Sabre jets. In Kay's view, the F-86 affair was particularly symbolic of the Canadian government's diplomacy of prudence.

Jewish community leaders, ranging from Senator David Croll to Canadian Jewish Congress President Samuel Bronfman, exerted pressure on St. Laurent to push through the F-86 sale. In September 1956, the transaction was approved by the cabinet. But in the wake of Israel's invasion of the Sinai Peninsula, St. Laurent suspended all arms shipments to Israel. Israel never bought the F-86, settling instead for French Mysteres and Mirages.

Kay identifies Lester B. Pearson, then foreign minister, as "the foremost factor" in the first decade of Canada-Israel relations. Pearson played an integral role in every decision that had a bearing on Israel, but never was he as visible as when he proposed the creation of a UN peacekeeping force to monitor the truce following the 1956 Arab-Israeli war.

Diplomacy of Prudence

In summarizing Canada's overall policy toward Israel, Kay maintains that the cabinet was guided first by a consideration for its Western friends, especially Britain, then by Israel's security needs and finally by UN requirements and domestic constraints.

"Canada tried to stay uninvolved wherever possible," he writes, "and when involvement became necessary it acted with balance and modesty and in concert with its allies."

Kay, who holds a BA degree from the University of Manitoba, combed Canadian and Israeli archives to produce The Diplomacy of Prudence, which, he claims, is the only study of its kind anywhere. He describes it as a sequel to Canada and Palestine: The Politics of Non-Commitment, a spinoff of his Hebrew University PhD.

Currently, Kay is hard at work on his third book, which, he says, will bring the story of Israel's ties with Canada up to 1968. Due to the 30-year rule at the Israel State Archives, he cannot as yet delve into the period from 1968 onward.

Kay, a past lecturer at the University of Saskatchewan, Trent University and the University of Ottawa, is the founder and a member of the Israel Association for Canadian Studies. In conjunction with the Halpert Centre for Canadian Studies at the Hebrew University, the association sponsors seminars, lectures and conferences.

"There is considerable interest in Israel in Canadian studies," he observes.

A semi-retired widower with four children, Kay was born in St. Boniface, Manitoba, the scion of Lithuanian and Ukrainian Jewish immigrants. As a boy in Winnipeg, he belonged to the Habonim Zionist youth group.

In 1974, he and his wife, Nomi, whom he had met in Jerusalem, decided to settle in Israel. Two months prior to their departure, she died. The tragedy did not deter him from making aliyah, nor did it impede his growth as a scholar, judging by his performance in The Diplomacy of Prudence.

THE Baycrest Campaign
Imagine Our Future Without It

To each and every member of our community:

For as long as I can remember, Baycrest has been here to serve our community by taking care of our elderly. In doing so, it has become a leader of research into aging, and has created systems of care that are recognized world-wide as adding quality to life.

To continue in this fashion, we have to be here for Baycrest. Every single one of us. The current Campaign has generated a good response. Now, we are in the final stretch, and we need support from every member of our community to reach our $60 million goal.

Sooner or later, one way or another, every Jewish family will be touched by Baycrest. Right now, Baycrest needs you. As Chair of the "Over the Top" Committee, I am asking you to write a cheque so Baycrest can continue caring for our Jewish elderly. We need you, and your support, because it's your Baycrest.

Sincerely,

Edwin Goldstein

P.S. For over 30 years, I have made Baycrest my personal commitment to the community. Today, I am prouder than ever of the work Baycrest does and the professionals and staff who make it all happen. This is the time to share your pride and commitment. Baycrest is calling on you.

Budget changes could help reduce taxes

By GEORGE WEINBERGER
Special to The CJN

Changes proposed in the Feb. 18 federal budget could save you taxes.

According to the budget, if you donate publicly traded securities before 2002 to a charity such as UJA Federation, you will only have to pay half the tax you would otherwise pay if you first sold the shares and then donated the cash. And the higher the gain on your donated shares, the greater your tax savings.

Let's take a simple example. If you sold stock for $2,000 that you bought for $1,000, you would pay approximately $400 in taxes on your capital gain at the top marginal rate. Under the new proposals, if you donated the same stock to a charity, you would only have to pay about $200 on the accrued gain. The stock donation would get you a $2,000 receipt on which you would save about $1,000 in taxes.

The government, recognizing the impact of dramatic public spending cuts on charities, has proposed several other measures to assist them in raising funds. The limit on charitable donations that you can claim each year on your tax return will now be 75 percent of your net income, up from 50 percent in 1996 and 20 percent in 1995.

If you donate assets to a charity, you will be able to claim donations of up to 75 percent of your other income, plus 100 percent of the taxable capital gain or recaptured capital cost allowance (i.e., tax depreciation) resulting from the gift.

Ottawa has also attempted to "level the playing field" for most charities. In the past, you could claim donations totaling 100 percent of your income on Crown gifts — to the government, universities, hospitals or other public institutions. It was a powerful incentive that often made it more attractive for large donors to give gifts to such establishments instead of other charities. To correct this imbalance, the budget proposes to reduce the limit for claiming Crown donations to 75 percent of net income. It is going to be the same for all charitable organizations.

Many people have set up their own private charitable foundations to which they have made donations, often with shares, debt or assets of family-owned companies, instead of cash.

Now, Finance Minister Paul Martin believes that "such gifts are not truly charitable because they are not made unconditionally." As a result, a special non-refundable 50 percent tax will be levied on the foundation for these donations in the future.

Be sure to analyse the budget's impact if, during your lifetime or in your will, you contemplate contributions to your private foundation, intend to donate gifts of shares or debt of your family-owned corporation or plan to contribute publicly traded securities to a charity.

Details of the proposals affecting charitable donations have not yet been finalized, so be sure to consult your financial advisors before you take any action.

The federal government has enriched tax incentives for charitable giving to encourage Canadians to make donations. Now it is up to us to respond by increasing our commitment.

UWO ISRAEL DAY

University of Western Ontario students Mark Zelunka, Elana Grosser and Shayna Rosenbaum (president of the Jewish Students' Union) staffed a Tu b'Shvat table at a recent Israel Day on campus. The event featured a poetry reading by Shel Krakofsky, performances by London Hebrew Day Schools students, the Hot Latkes Klezmer Band and two comedians from Comedywood. Representatives from various Jewish and Israeli organizations were also on hand.

York Region teens seek place of their own

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — If York Region's Jewish teenagers have their every wish fulfilled, the Jewish community will provide them with an ultra-cool, nearby, safe place to hang out. Music and a juice bar would add the finishing touches.

The hang-out was a recurring theme at the recent youth symposium held at Westmount Collegiate under the auspices of UJA Federation. A Jewish teen sports league was also suggested.

About 50 teens showed up for the event, the federation's first major outreach effort since Saul Cohen took on the new position of York Region outreach worker last month.

The Sunday event, held to determine needs and introduce teens to existing services, was initiated by a committee studying services in the region. Members decided it was best to get input directly from those involved, said committee chair Dov Altman.

"You are the future of the Jewish community," UJA Federation president Sandy Brown told participants.

The community can provide them with staff and "hopefully" a centre, Brown said, indicating that whatever results from the symposium will be a joint effort of teens and the federation.

"What I hear today gave me confidence that you can make this thing move in a direction that is positive. I'm going to go back to our leadership and say this is a very important thing, so that you, who will be leaders of the Jewish community in the not too distant future, will have the nourishment you need to get there."

The whole symposium was conceived and organized by teens, noted Cohen, who stressed the importance of their follow-up if anything is to come of it.

For high school students, the social aspect is very important, noted several participants. One suggested that a religious program like a Shabbaton might be a long-term goal, but to attract a high school crowd in the first place, a dance would have more appeal.

Rebecca Wortzman, 18, a student at Vaughan Secondary School, noted that transportation was another important factor. In the brainstorming session she facilitated, a low-cost shuttle service was proposed.

Thornhill Secondary School student Ronen Gaisiner, 14, wants "fun" and "interesting" programs.

Another participant suggested extending outreach to junior high students, who might be more eager to try a new group, especially if it has the cachet of being endorsed by older kids.

At an age where career and life decisions are imminent, it's necessary to become familiar with something in order to decide whether you want to be a part of it, said Susan Jackson, director of continuity programming.

Vaughan student Elyse Axelrod, 15, attended the symposium at the suggestion of her mother. "I really didn't want to," she admitted. But she thought the students came up with "some really good ideas" that address the scarcity of activities for Jewish teens in the area.

Participants plan to spread the word. "We [at the symposium] are a small part of the Jewish community, and we have to talk to others to see what they want to do," said Carly Naster, 15.

Michelle Melov, a friend of Carly and Elyse's, was impressed that the community sought the opinions of teens themselves.

Some of the participants are already involved Jewishly in organizations like Tsabar (Israeli scouts) or B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO).

Brian Wasserman, going on 19, is active in BBYO so he can "connect to what's out there." He was a member of the committee that organized the symposium.

The day-long event also featured a talk by Eli Rubenstein of United Israel Appeal who urged teens to make their voices heard. A video of local teens discussing their Jewish identity and involvement served as a springboard for discussion.

According to a demographic study released last year, York Region, Canada's fastest growing Jewish community, has an estimated Jewish population of 50,000, the third-largest in the country after Toronto and Montreal. UJA Federation has traditionally included the area as part of Metro.

Rabbinic Reflections

A time for taxes

By RABBI MARTIN S. COHEN

There must be something about springtime that makes people want to pay their taxes. In this day and age, we all know when taxes are due, but not everybody knows that they were due on the first of Nisan — also a springtime date — in ancient times as well.

To this day, in fact, the Sabbath that falls just before the month of Adar begins (or, in years with two months of Adar, before the second one begins), is called Shabbat Shekalim, in commemoration of the half-shekel tax paid by Jewish people all over the ancient world towards the upkeep of the Temple; the tax was due just one month later.

The origin of the tax is recorded in Scripture in a passage that can bear some interesting analysis. Moses was bidden to take a census of the people. In fact, the Torah records two separate censuses that were taken, one at the end of the first year of wandering and another towards the end of the Israelites' desert sojourn. What these censuses have to do with the Temple tax is made clear in the passage that is read as the maftir passage in synagogue on Shabbat Shekalim.

The passage, taken from the 30th chapter of Exodus, starts out by warning Moses that one of the unwanted side effects of taking a census is the risk of plague. The plague, Scripture asserts, is avoidable, however, and the way to ward it off is for all those counted to give up a half-shekel as what the Torah calls kessef kippurim, a kind of atonement tax intended to head off the danger before anything untoward has time to happen.

There is no hint in the Torah that this is to be an annual event. That Scripture makes a point of saying the money was to be used for the upkeep of the desert sanctuary suggested that an annual tax was the proper way to allow all citizens to participate in the maintenance of the Temple.

The Torah makes a special point of noting that each citizen must pay precisely one-half shekel, that rich people may not give more, nor poorer pay less.

This stands in stark contrast to the way funds and materials were collected for the construction of the Tabernacle in the first place. There, the Torah is equally clear that there is no limit on donations and that people may give or not give as their hearts prompt. Why were the rich allowed to give more and the poor less towards the construction of the Tabernacle while each person had to give precisely the same amount towards its upkeep?

I suppose that hidden within the distinction is something Scripture is trying to say about the nature of our spiritual lives. The construction of the desert sanctuary is symbolic of the way each of us sets about constructing a life of communion with God — some of us richer and others poorer, some more successful and others less so, some of us more possessed of the inner strength necessary to live a life of service to God and others of us less sure of our way.

The mitzvah of supporting the Tabernacle with an annual coin, on the other hand, is symbolic of the fact that God offers each of us the same Torah to follow or — God forbid — to reject. The sameness of the coin all must offer suggests the challenge of investing the rituals and rites that form the stuff of Judaism with enough will and sense of spiritual purpose to make them appropriate acts of worship by individuals.

Taken together, the twin mitzvot of contributing to the building of the sanctuary and contributing to its upkeep suggest the paradox that rests at the core of organized Jewish worship: the need to embrace the same Torah as the rest of the people at the same time as we are bidden to fashion personal lives as distinct and different from the spiritual lives of other people as we are from them.

The resolution of the paradox is the great goal of Jewish spirituality and it strikes me, therefore, as appropriate, even mildly encouraging, to consider that the same paradox that rests at the core of our spiritual lives today has such a clear reflection in the Scriptural account of the construction of the earliest Jewish sanctuary, the desert Tabernacle.

Oh Brave New World...

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

The Brave New World is here. Dolly, a lamb born in July, is the creation of scientists at Scotland's Roslin Institute in Edinburgh. Dolly is not like other sheep. She was cloned from genetic material taken from the udder of a 6-year-old ewe and is an exact genetic duplicate of her "mother." And so the stuff of science fiction is reality, as is the possibility of man's creating man in his own image.

Comparative Law

What does Judaism say about this phenomenon? While there is no precedent for cloning per se, Jewish tradition does recognize the capacity for creating life by other than natural means. The golem, a creature created in mystical ways through the use of divine Names, is the prime example. The Talmud records that the Babylonian sage Rava created a golem (Sanhedrin 65b); the most popular one is attributed to Maharal of Prague; and tradition has it that the Vilna Gaon told his disciple Rabbi Chaim of Volozhin that as a boy he had decided to make a golem, but desisted. It seems to me that Judaism is not concerned about creating life by artificial means.

There are, however, other halachic questions. Let's assume that some DNA was taken from Reuven and cloned into Shimon. Does Shimon have a mother or a father? Is Reuven his father, or are Reuven's parents his parents? Or is his mother the lab scientist who performed the procedure? Do they receive separate shares of the inheritance or must they divide one portion? Does Shimon have a unique identity apart from Reuven, or is he one and the same with him? In practical terms: Are they both married to the same woman? Is one liable for the debts incurred by the other? If Reuven has already gone to shul or put on t'fillin in the morning, must Shimon do the same?

The closest parallel in Jewish texts is a discussion of co-joined twins. These twins have the identical genetic material, they develop from one egg and they are attached to one another. The Talmud, Menachot 37a, questions: If such twins have two heads, on which head must he/they put the t'fillin? If he/they are the first born, must a parent pay five shekels or 10 for the pidyon haben? Jewish law recognizes them as two distinct and separate individuals. They must wear t'fillin on both heads.

Of greater concern are the moral issues that such scientific knowhow creates. And the ethical community does not know how to respond. May a person be cloned to provide organs for potential transplant? It seems to me that if Shimon is considered a separate human being, then he is entitled to the integrity of his own body and organs. Thus, he may not be viewed as inferior to Reuven or as merely a resource for "spare parts."

May an exceptional leader or scholar be cloned over and over again for the contributions he could continuously make toward the welfare of society or the understanding of Torah?

It seems to me that the answer is no. Judaism respects the unique contributions that each generation, its leaders and its scholars, can make. Dor dor vedorshav (each generation and its leaders) and Yiftach bedoro keShmuel bedoro (Jeptha in his generation is as authoritative as Samuel in his generation) express the rabbinic understanding that each generation must have leaders who are uniquely appropriate to it and its special needs.

And opportunities must be given to others to make their own contributions to the world. Rashi, in his commentary to Hullin 7a, comments, "If our children who come after us will find nothing to contribute, how will they achieve fame?"

Thus, cloning vegetation or even animals in order to further medical science or to improve agriculture is morally neutral and, it seems to me, halachically permissible. Cloning human beings is wrong.

Finding hidden messages

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Last month I introduced the theme of hidden truths present within our text and our universe.

The theme appears several times in the Book of Esther and the holiday of Purim. Esther is instructed to hide her identity from the king and to hide her relationship with Mordecai; G-d hides His Divine intervention from the reader.

The hidden realities echo through the text. However, in the spirit of Purim, I would like to share another aspect of hidden meanings as food for thought.

The Canadian Jewish News printed a small article commenting on the reading from the book of Isaiah that coincided with the tragic helicopter collision in Israel. The passage from the text read that week included Isaiah 7:3 (the number 73 depicting the number of lives lost in the disaster). The text mentions the name Sha'ar Yishuv, which was the location of the accident. The text further mentions "two smoldering tails," eerily bringing to mind the image of the two helicopters colliding. The coincidences between the text and the historical event are noteworthy, but in what way?

Many times several of my students raise the question of our seeming inability to identify the Divine presence in the world around us. If G-d did such miraculous things in the Bible, why are we not seeing miracles today? Why did G-d speak to us through prophets in the past but sends no prophets now?

These questions reach to the very core of our identities and our individual relationships with G-d. The possible answers are complex and multi-faceted. Needless to say, my students asked me to share my thoughts on the Isaiah passage and the tragedy in Israel.

I mentioned to these pupils that if one were to consider the text prophetic in that it predicted the event, that alone is not a message.

Prophecy must teach us something about ourselves or our society or our relationships. Prediction without meaning does not advance us; it does not show us where we have erred or prescribe a more beneficial path for the future. I was ready to dismiss the coincidence at that point, but my students relentlessly pulled the imagery apart and produced the following:

One group of Jews were in one helicopter and another group of Jews were in a second helicopter. The two groups came at each other and collided, leaving carnage in their wake. The helicopters were filled with ammunition and therefore kept exploding. When anyone could finally approach the site, nothing remained. Perhaps, say my students, this is a warning against civil war. Perhaps the message from the Bible and the tragic event do have meaning. We have been so divided since Rabin's death we have even clashed violently with each other. Perhaps, say my students, the message is that we must never become two groups of Jews colliding, for we may leave nothing in our wake.

Perhaps the rabbis were correct in saying the secrets of the universe issue from the mouths of the very young.

The Albright syndrome

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

A month ago, the Washington Post revealed that newly appointed secretary of state Madeleine Albright, although raised a Catholic, had been born into a Jewish family and that many of her relatives, including three grandparents, had died in the Holocaust.

The reporter who broke the story, which was apparently news even to Albright, backed it up with Auschwitz transport lists, documents from Czech and Jewish archives and interviews with family friends and relatives.

Albright says her parents, who brought her from her native Czechoslovakia to America as a child, never told her they were Jews who had converted to Christianity.

Some of her associates, including sources within the Israeli government, have speculated publicly whether she had truly been in the dark about her family's Jewish past, since others appear to have known about it all along.

As editorial writer Philip Taubman wrote in the New York Times: "How could someone as worldly and intelligent as Ms. Albright never have inquired about her background, never have known that three grandparents perished in Nazi concentration camps, never have guessed her parents' Catholic faith might be adopted?"

On such a personal matter it seems impertinent to ask, as if investigating a Watergate-style cover-up, what Albright knew and when she knew it. That is entirely her business; there is no correct timetable for making discoveries about one's roots. Indeed, by pursuing such fruitless avenues of inquiry, one is apt to miss the main significance of the Post's Albright discovery.

The truth is, Albright's story is not so rare. During the Holocaust, multitudes of European Jews shed their religious identities as they struggled to survive under the most dire conditions imaginable. Also, countless Jewish children were passed into Christian hands and raised in the religion of their rescuers. Some of the so-called "hidden children" later found their way back to Judaism; some did not. Even after half a century, their stories and true identities are still emerging.

An astonishing statistic: According to a caretaker of Vienna's sprawling Central Cemetery, fully one-half of the persons laid to rest in recent years in that historic Jewish burial ground lived as agnostics or lapsed Christians, revealing their Jewish birth to others only on their deathbeds.

Peter Kuhn, a 27-year-old financial analyst in Toronto, has discovered his Jewish roots only in recent years. His Czech-born mother, having been orphaned at three, had enshrouded the essential details of her painful past in the silence typical of many survivors.

"For me, it's been a big, big awakening," Kuhn says. "It's given me an identity. I've come such a long way, it's hard for me to remember how much I was in the dark before."

One day in 1994, Torontonian Leon Eidelberg made an even more momentous discovery. A survivor of the Lvov ghetto, he came home from grocery shopping to find a telephone message from the son that he and his wife Mira had left as an infant with a Polish-Catholic family in 1943.

After Mira was killed, the family holding their son moved away, leaving no forwarding address.

After the war, Eidelberg searched throughout Poland and, downhearted, left for Palestine in 1948. In Italy, he met and married a second wife, Nusia, with whom he came to Canada and had two sons. Although the search for his Polish-born son became dormant, Eidelberg never gave up hope of finding him.

In 1994, the International Red Cross found his son, Jerzy, in Gliwice, Poland. When Jerzy came to Canada to meet his 81-year-old father, their tearful reunion was televised across the country.

"The visit was extremely emotional for everybody," recalls Jackson Eidelberg, Jerzy's half-brother, born in Montreal in 1949.

On his next visit, Jerzy brought his wife and children. When Leon Eidelberg died in October 1996 at the age of 83, it was with the knowledge that he, like the biblical Jacob, had found a long-lost son and touched the faces of grandchildren he had never dreamed existed.

TWO ROUTES FOR UJA FEDERATION WALK '97

UJA Federation is adding a second route to the 1997 Walk for Israel so that more people can take part in the Jewish community's most popular annual event.

The first contingent of walkers will be Stepping Out for Israel on Sunday May 25 at 10:30 a.m. from the Promenade Shopping Centre to North York's Centennial Centre on Finch west of Bathurst. The second route starts at 12:30 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, heading north and then east to the Festival.

"The two routes will make it more convenient for people to take part," explains Walk Chair Carole Sterling. Last year's Walk drew more than 7,000 community members.

The money raised goes toward meeting the needs of new immigrant children arriving in Israel.

Recruitment for the Walk begins next month when volunteers visit Jewish schools to make presentations and give out sponsor kits. In addition to synagogues and youth groups, for the first time, UJA Federation will be promoting the Walk in libraries and shopping malls in order to reach a larger segment of the community.

"We're really branching out this year to meet the needs of the community," says Fran Grundman, who is co-chairing Walk recruitment with Arlyn Zimmerman. "We've come up with some innovative ways to go beyond traditional boundaries."

The Festival at Centennial Centre, 11:00 a.m. - 3:30 p.m. will feature live musical performances, a kosher barbecue, arts & crafts, a petting zoo, pony rides and Mandell Entertainment.

New attractions include virtual reality machines and a Sony play station.

Carole Sterling is supported by a Walk Cabinet which includes: Jeffrey Cohen, Maura Cooperberg, Fran Grundman, Marcy Kroach, Corey Mandell, Gilda Niman, Tracy Rain, Avi Rodak, Laya Rusonik, Brian Schachter, Miri Schneiderman and Arlyn Zimmerman.

More than 7,000 participants marched down Bathurst Street at last year's Walk.

A Matter of Class

Community Matters is pleased to introduce A Matter of Class - a regular column profiling Jewish supplementary schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation. In our first column, we take a look at Temple Sinai's innovative educational initiatives.

Dr. Ira Schweitzer, Director of Education at Temple Sinai, doesn't want his school to be a drop-off centre where parents leave their children for a crash course in Judaism.

"We want the whole family to be involved," says Schweitzer, who was hired by the synagogue 8 years ago to make family education a priority. "This way, whatever they learn in the classroom can be reinforced at home." In fact, parental involvement is so important at Temple Sinai Religious School, parents are invited to attend selected classes from junior kindergarten all the way up to grades 11 and 12.

The school is also involved in a program, funded by UJA Federation that trains educators to teach in classrooms with both parents and children.

In grades 4, 5 and 6, between 65 and 70 families a month participate in classes. In grade 9, parents are encouraged to join their children in parent-teen dialogues 5 times a year with the help of Jewish Family and Child Service facilitators. This year, topics include drugs and alcohol, stereotyping and prejudice and various aspects of life in Israel. Temple Sinai's Bar Mitzva Institute for boys and girls also offers parental participation in three classes, and for students in grades 11, 12 and OAC, the school runs the Sinai Society - a once a month gathering where critical issues are discussed.

As part of the family classroom, parents and their children take part in many activities bringing lessons to life, such as making Purim gregors (noise-makers) and hanging home made mezuzot, during Chanuka, at special home dedication ceremonies.

"These kinds of activities teach people how to do things Jewish," explains Schweitzer. "It gives them a sense of ownership and commitment to living according to Jewish customs and traditions."

Temple Sinai Religious School is one of 33 supplementary schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education. For more information about education at Temple Sinai call (416) 487-3281.

ISRAEL EXPERIENCE FOR THE WHOLE FAMILY

Lori and Sheldon Disenhouse have been actively involved with UJA Federation for years, but this summer, the entire Disenhouse family is getting in on the act as chairpeople of UJA Federation's Family Fun Mission to Israel.

The mission, from August 4-13, is designed for all family members with a unique combination of history and adventure. The fun-for-all-ages itinerary includes a jeep ride through the Galilee, inner-tubing down the Jordan River and a climb up to Masada. Some of the participants, including the eldest Disenhouse daughter Sari, will celebrate their bar and bat mitzva ceremonies in the ancient synagogue high atop Masada, the monument to Jewish revolt against Roman rule.

"This is the perfect way to mark our daughter's bat mitzva and to make the occasion all the more special," explains Lori, a volunteer in Jewish Women's Federation. She says Sari 12, Josh 10 and Yael 7 are looking forward to travelling with other kids and making new friends.

"Nothing compares to the atmosphere on a UJA Federation mission," she adds.

Sheldon Disenhouse, a member of UJA Federation's Board of Directors, says the mission is a "great opportunity to combine what the kids learn in school with real life experience." He also says the Family Fun Mission is the natural choice because UJA Federation "is such a big part of our everyday lives."

The cost for a family of four (2 adults 2 children) starts at $5,975 plus airfare. Meals, deluxe hotels, ground transportation and special events are included. A minimum UJA Federation campaign pledge of $1,000 per family is required for participation.

For more information contact Mark Freedman at (416) 631-5691.

Performance to benefit Yiddish studies at U of T

You can be sure Avi Hoffman's commitment to Yiddish is no act. That's because a portion of proceeds from the Yiddish entertainer's upcoming Toronto premiere performance of Reflections of a Golden Peacock will help support theYiddish Studies program at U of T.

The play, which tells the story of Yiddish poet Itzik Manger, is this year's gala fundraiser sponsored by The Committee for Yiddish Studies at U of T, an arm of UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish.

U of T Committee for Yiddish Chair Bayla Chaikoff is pleased to welcome Hoffman back after his success at last year's gala and says "you don't have to speak Yiddish to enjoy the show."

Reflections of a Golden Peacock premieres on Sunday March 16, 7:30 p.m., Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. A special reception will follow. Tickets are $50.00 and can be obtained by calling (416) 787-0526.

Otzma delivers Israel hands-on

Twenty-three year old Aviva Waxman is convinced there's no better way to experience Israel than to live and work there.

The University of Western Ontario graduate is one of four Torontonians participating in the 1996/97 Project Otzma. The ten month UJA Federation funded program, which goes from August to June, sends young adults to Israel as volunteers to strengthen bonds between Israel and the Diaspora.

For the first three months, Otzma participants attend Hebrew classes and work on a kibbutz. After that, they spend another three months volunteering at an immigration absorption centre or an aliya youth village, followed by three weeks at projects of their choice such as a desert agricultural settlement, studying Jewish text in Jerusalem or helping out at an army base.

The final portion of the program is spent at UJA Federation funded Partnership 2000 sites in the Eilat-Eilot region where volunteers work together with local residents to enhance the community's quality of life.

Waxman, who had visited Israel once before in 1990, chose Project Otzma this time because she "didn't want to experience Israel from inside a bus window." Only half way through the program, Waxman says she "already feels like she's at home."

Otzma participant Karen Silverstein, who returned last year, called the time she spent volunteering at a day centre for the elderly in Eilat "a life changing experience." Now that she's back home, Silverstein plans to continue volunteering in the community.

Applications for Project Otzma can be obtained by calling Karen Worb at (416) 631-5731.

New clothing wanted

UJA Federation's Fashion Division is asking local businesses to donate new surplus clothing for distribution to needy Jews living in the Former Soviet Union and in our own community.

Hundreds of letters have been sent to manufacturers, retailers, distributors and importers asking for contributions of coats, sweaters, denim, sweats and children's clothing.

Laurie Cohen, who is co-chairing the clothing drive with Jeff Alter, says the inspiration for the project came from true life stories about hardships suffered by poverty stricken Jews living in countries such as the Ukraine, Belarus, Azerbaijan and Bulgaria.

Some clothing will also be distributed locally through the Just A Second clothing store operated by Jewish Family and Child Service.

Participants to date include The Incredible Clothing Co., Princess Garments, Silvert's Clothing, Remco Forwarding, Coatz, Riggins Apparel Group and Texappeal. If your business would like to make a contribution please contact Elana Carr at (416) 631-5736.

Aliyah Centre helps students with Israel decisions

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Students who are considering aliyah, especially those with Israeli backgrounds, would be well advised to call the Israel Aliyah Centre, said Miri Gur, aliyah shlichah, at a recent student meeting.

Israelis, whether or not born in Israel, can miss out on the benefits accorded to new olim, without realizing it.

"If they study in a university in Israel in a recognized program and then go on aliyah, they might find their benefits are gone," Gur said. (Benefits, such as rent subsidies or free tuition, are limited to a specific time period after the move to Israel.)

About three dozen university students gathered at the Lipa Green building for the meeting, which was organized by York University student Jay Wohlgelernter.

"A lot of students spend time in Israel, and a very common feeling coming back is, 'I want to make aliyah when I finish my studies,'" Wohlgelernter said. He organized the session to counter a problem of theirs: an ebbing away of motivation if they don't take steps to move toward their goal.

The Aliyah Centre, Jewish Campus Services and Tehilla were partners in organizing the meeting. Wohlgelernter credited Jonathan Snobell, a student at Yeshiva University, for coming up with the idea.

"This is to get the wheels going," Wohlgelernter said.

An alumnus of the Magen David Adom volunteer program who has also studied for a year at an Israeli yeshiva, he expects it will be another seven to eight years before he is ready to make aliyah himself.

The event was the first of its kind geared specifically to university students. Gur offered information about employment internships, programs and an essay contest in which first prize is a ticket to Israel. The contest is sponsored by the University Student department of the World Zionist Organization.

Rebecca Jacob, a second-year University of Toronto student, participated in a job internship program, testing computer software at a company in Jerusalem. "It's a great way to sort of get your foot in the door," she said. "I made a lot of friends."

Gur discussed army obligations, which vary according to age and whether the person is Israeli by birth. She noted that a representative of the Israeli army will be in Toronto this spring for those who want more extensive information.

Of the options Gur mentioned, the WUJS Institute in Arad has the only program offering paid employment on a tourist visa. The one-year program begins with six months of ulpan, and the work half can be extended for a further six months.

The advantage, stressed Gur, is that "you're still not an oleh chadash and your rights and benefits are not starting to run out."

Another program worth noting is the one that retrains new olim as English teachers for elementary through high school. To qualify, they need a bachelor's degree and are promised a job for the first two years after graduating.

One student asked if it was necessary to go to ulpan for those already familiar with Hebrew.

"You don't have to, but it's a benefit," answered Gur. "It's free for the first five months. If you plan to live in Israel, the more you know, the better you are. If you ask me, grab the opportunity." Evening ulpanim, held after working hours, are also available, she noted.

University of Toronto student Yoni Stanleigh, thought the meeting "would end up being a lot of talk and no action" but said he found it "very positive. The opportunities are there...It's a good thing to know."

Wohlgelernter hopes to have a follow-up program scheduled before Pesach.

Eyal Sartov is Israel's number one tennis champion. His toughest shot is his forehand topspin from the baseline. 'Opponents fear it the most' he says. And there is his psychological strength, which he believes is 'a tennis player's most precious asset.

Sartov is a double amputee below his knees. In 1978, he stepped on a mine left over from the Six Day War in the Golan Heights. Being a tennis pro means hard work, an exceptionally high level of discipline and being totally focused. Sartov trains twice a day at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. He works out in the weight room almost 10 hours a week. Argentinian rabbi visits Canada

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Ruben Sasersdein, spiritual leader of Dor Hadash synagogue in Buenos Aires, has come to Canada to see how some of his flock are doing.

He told The CJN in a recent telephone interview that two years ago the chair of the Jewish community of Winnipeg and an official of the Manitoba government came to Buenos Aires to invite Argentinian Jews to settle in Winnipeg.

The first contingent of four families has just received landed immigrant status, and some others came a few months ago. Two more families are arriving shortly.

"They are doing OK," the rabbi said. "They are learning English at government schools, sending their kids to school and looking for jobs."

A new committee, headed by Sid Halperin, current head of the Winnipeg Jewish community, has just been formed to help the Argentinians in practical ways, such as finding employment, and housing.

"They [the Argentinians] like the place," Rabbi Sasersdein said. "They have formed a close relationship with the Jewish community and are invited for dinner and Shabbat and things like that. But they are worrying about finding jobs."

Economic conditions are the main reasons these people are leaving Argentina, the rabbi said. "They worry about the lack of future for them there," much more than they worry about anti-Semitism, even in the wake of the bombing of the community centre in 1995.

The rebuilt centre, which will be in the same location, as demanded by the insurance company, will have more security in place, as well as more facilities.

The Jewish population in Argentina, which now stands at 209,000 (mainly in Buenos Aires), is decreasing, Rabbi Sasersdein said, partly as a result of assimilation and intermarriage, but mainly from immigration.

"Twelve hundred went to Israel last year. It is beginning to be a problem."

Nevertheless, he said, the community in Buenos Aires is strong, with schools, community centres and "a Jewish network" which, he said, lessens the assimilation and intermarriage rate.

The rabbi was in Toronto to meet with officials of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and with Canadian Jewish Congress officer Irving Abella "to develop a relationship between my congregation and the Jewish community here. We think that maybe it is not so easy to get jobs in Winnipeg, so we should think about other places in Canada."

THE BORINS BEAT

Every week I change the words on display outside my office, like . . . A goal is a dream with a deadline. I guess, as a fundraiser, my favourite is . . . The more you give, the more you get.

A few weeks ago I was moved by the words Jeremy Diamond wrote in The Globe and Mail about his late beloved grandfather Irving Lerman. Irving was a real original who loved the Blue Jays. We were both there at the birth of the Jays. Irving got to throw the opening pitch when his Thrifty's sponsored a home game. Jeremy's dad is Charlie Diamond, a real mensche. He and Rochelle quite often share a shabbat meal at their home with a Reena client. He'll always make time for a guy like me to pick his brains over some breakfast fare at the United Bakers . . . and the hour we share usually flies by. I'm thrilled that Charlie and Edwin Goldstein, past chair of the Baycrest Board, read my words. Lou Mostyn reminded me of his Sami days with Peter Munk, Richard Cole and Gerry Schwartz. I brought greetings to Charlie from his old friends, (15 years with the Avenue Road Hockey League) Al & Sheila Mostyn.

Harley Mintz dropped by our table to ask about our golfing prowess. Harley is excited to once again be helping with the combined Reena/Jewish National Fund 2nd Annual Golf Tournament on June 18th. Harley will be of enormous help to Mike and Sue Feldman, Reena's co-chairs for this year's tournament. I really don't know where he gets the energy!!! Sitting nearby was Michael Florence who I had seen a few days earlier at our barber . . . Vito & Sam. I meant to tell Michael Florence that Honey Sherman is also helping with the golf tournament. Also saw Judith Bloom and Genya Intrator and of course the ubiquitous Ruth Ladovsky.

I enjoy comparing T.V. mohel stories with Dr. Aaron Jesin, mohel & family physician. He likes the one on L.A. Law & the Seinfeld one is my favourite.

You have to sparkle when you see some of Sol Unger's Act II creations. There was Jean Altman showing her special pendant with a diamond added for each grandchild. I counted 10!!! How about Mike Zigelstein surprising Mary Bertucci with a sparkling diamond engagement ring!

Sorry I was not able to get together with the late Gerry Morris recently. Hillard Conway & I were looking forward to it. Gerry's words were enjoyed by CJN readers for years.

Congratulations to Elli Davis who once again is #1 sales rep in Canada for Royal LePage.

Can't wait to see Al Waxman as Willy Loman at the Stratford Festival. Judd Hirsch's Willy Loman captivated everyone in Death of a Salesman at Mirvish's Royal Alexandra Theatre. I was telling Sheila Engel & Phil Ladovsky how I finally landed on "Broadway" with my wonderful new assistant Eleanor Ziv.

Jews, Germans discuss past at conference in Berlin

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a child of Holocaust survivors and director of Toronto's Holocaust Education & Memorial Centre, Pnina Zilberman, 46, is well aware of the common denominators linking her second generation counterparts.

On a recent trip to Germany, where she attended the country's first public conference on the relations between descendents of Holocaust victims and victimizers, she was struck — not for the first time — by common elements she shares with children of perpetrators.

"Number one is secrets," said Zilberman. Although there are survivors who are open about their past, it's common for both victims and perpetrators never to have talked to their children about life before 1950.

"There's a tension there. We would be afraid of asking about something our parents don't feel comfortable discussing."

The issue of trust is another shared element, Zilberman said. "We were taught not to trust. There are commonalities, but for the opposite reason."

As if to emphasize the five decades that have passed since survivors started rebuilding their lives, Zilberman learned about the conference — which was organized by Berlin's Institut für Vergleichende Geschichtswissenschaften and the Second Generation Trust in London, England — via the Internet.

The two-day conference, held in Berlin, was tremendously significant, she said. Not only was it held on the 52nd anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz (which has been designated Holocaust commemoration day in Germany), but some of the German organizers, born after the war, risked strained or even severed relationships with their parents for pursuing such interaction.

"I admire all these Germans who are willing to take on this kind of involvement," Zilberman said. Following the conference, it was decided to hold future meetings only in Germany to show support for them, she added. The conference attracted a moderate amount of local media attention.

Topics covered included intergenerational transmission of the Holocaust, trauma in victim and victimizer families, the necessity of researching family history, facilitated encounters between descendents of victims and victimizers and the need to cope with the emotional aspects of remembering.

Zilberman was the only Canadian among the 450 at the conference. Other Jewish participants came from Great Britain, the United States, Israel, Australia and Europe, but the majority were Jewish and non-Jewish Germans.

Of the non-Jewish participants, Zilberman was particularly interested in a Dutch group whose parents had collaborated with the Nazis. Apparently they began as a government-funded, self-help organization 14 years ago, she said. One of them marvelled at how nice Zilberman (as a child of survivors) was to him.

For her, one of the frustrations of the conference was that "people were upset, but in a nice, diplomatic way. I wanted to see more emotion."

Although the conference evoked no tears, it was very intense, she said. She herself didn't feel the full impact until she returned home. The experience "served as a catalyst for me to revisit my [personal] baggage."

Following the conference, Zilberman spoke to teenagers at a school in Stadthagen, a town of 25,000 people which had a pre-war Jewish population of 55. "These kids have never seen a Jew in their lives. They are...the grandchildren of the perpetrator society."

Zilberman is planning an exchange program for local public high school students and their counterparts in Stadthagen, geared to begin in 1998. The program, she says, is one way of continuing the work that began at the conference.

A wrap-up session attended by about 40 participants was held immediately following the conference. Participants discussed the possibilities of opening dialogue in their respective communities, a more difficult task in Canada than the United States, Zilberman said, because of the issue of war criminals who found refuge here.

Also, Canada "is more on the traditional side. I think we have to change it; we cannot live on in anger, we cannot live on constantly blaming — not that I'm forgiving [the perpetrators]...what I'm trying to do is take one step ahead and open a dialogue."

Zilberman insists she doesn't dwell on the negative aspects of the Holocaust. Her work is one way of dealing with her legacy.

"Nothing is going to bring back my grandparents, my aunts, my uncles. The fact that I was born I see as a gift, and I celebrate being alive every day."

Dratch leaving Shaarei Shomayim

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Rabbi Mark Dratch, for five years, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in North York, is leaving Toronto at the end of June.

He will be assuming the position of spiritual leader of Agudath Sholom synagogue in Stamford, Conn.

It will be a homecoming in a sense, as Agudath Sholom is where he served for two years as assistant rabbi at the start of his rabbinic career.

In an interview with The CJN, Rabbi Dratch said somewhat wistfully that things would be perfect if he could "take this city and transplant it."

The decision to leave was "long and difficult," he said, adding that "it won't be easy."

The reason he is leaving, he said, is that he and his wife wanted to be closer to their families.

"[Toronto] is a very family oriented city. We felt that our children were lacking a family of their own."

Toronto, he said, is "a wonderful city, and Shaarei Shomayim is a wonderful congregation. I enjoyed developing relationships within and outside the shul."

Rabbi Mark Dratch

made the synagogue "open for a wide number of people, and different levels of commitment."

"I wanted to show the beauty of Torah and Judaism, that it has something to offer everyone. There are many models of Judaism to be comfortable with that are halachically appropriate."

Rabbi Dratch has expanded opportunities for women at Shaarei Shomayim, in study, prayer and congregational involvement. He is perhaps best known for allowing a Rosh Chodesh women's service.

"My philosophy in general is to be true to halachah, and yet at the same time find an opportunity for everyone."

A pray and learn service he instituted, run by Elliott Malamet, is designed for "those who don't feel comfortable" in the large, main service.

Rabbi Dratch also instituted a synagogue seder, which serves "those who might not have a seder, or might not know how to run one." Some 160 people attend, including many Russian immigrants, he said.

A rabbi's job, he mused, is that of "a teacher, leader, comforter, counsellor, preacher. Sometimes we fail — sometimes we aren't there, or we don't respond appropriately, or we are so overwhelmed by our duties or family responsibilities that we don't do what we would want to do."

Most people, however, show their appreciation, he said, and that is very necessary. "We want to recognize when we are on the right track."

Michael Goldrich, president of Shaarei Shomayim, called Rabbi Dratch's going "a loss for the synagogue and the community. But we dealt with each other with mutual respect, and in a dignified way, and so we have to understand."

He said that a search for a replacement is already underway, and that they hope that there will be no break in rabbinic leadership.

Greater sense of responsiblity

He praised the Orthodox community of Toronto, especially the "calibre of its rabbis and its institutions. The dedication of its people is wonderful."

He also praised the "congeniality that allows for respectful disagreement" in the city.

Choosing his words carefully, he said that he believes, nevertheless, that Toronto has needs to be addressed, especially concerning cooperation and respect between people. "Sometimes people are judgmental, and not respectful of differences."

The Orthodox community as a whole, he said, needs to have a greater sense of responsibility in dealing with disagreements, especially about Israel, and religious values.

People have to recognize problems that are not just in the Orthodox community, but in the larger Jewish community as well, such as spousal and child abuse, special needs children, and religious divorce (get).

He said that he is proud that he

BJC DONATION

Ceramic artist Herman Reches recently donated three of his sculptures to the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). At left, Reches is seen in the BJC atrium with his sculpture of Moses descending Mount Sinai. Based on last Saturday's parshah, the work is dedicated to Reches' parents, Lazer and Yente, who perished in the Holocaust. Near left is Lazer Reches, circa World War I, when he fought in the Austro-Hungarian army. Herman Reches, a survivor in his mid-80s, is artist in residence at the Koffler Centre School of Visual Art. Group disappointed in Netanyahu

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ruth Matar, founder and leader of Women for Israel's Tomorrow (The Women in Green), has a simple question.

"If we don't have the right to live in our holy cities of Hebron and Jerusalem, why do we have any right at all to live in Tel Aviv or Haifa?"

If Israel lets go of "the graves of our forefathers, the land purchased by Abraham, and where King David's first kingdom was, we have let go our justification for the land of Israel."

This is exactly what Yasser Arafat is counting on, Matar told The CJN in an interview last week. She was in Toronto for the only Canadian stop on a North American speaking tour.

Ruth Matar

The organization is very disappointed that Benjamin Netanyahu, whom they supported in the last election, has turned out to be "a weak leader. Of course, he is subject to tremendous pressure, from the United States, from the [Israeli] left, and from his own supporters."

Israel has not only abandoned the Jews in Hebron, Matar charged, it has also abandoned its Arab population, who used to be able to appeal to the High Court, but now find themselves unable to do so. They are subject, she said, to kidnapping , interrogation and torture by the Palestinian Authority.

In Hebron, she said, Jewish settlers are not allowed to move around freely, to build, or to occupy property previously owned by Jews and abandoned after the 1929 massacre. In fact, those properties, previously considered state property by Israel, were turned over to the Palestinian Authority.

"Jews are so concerned about Jewish property in Switzerland and in France — as they should be. But here, [Israel itself] turned over Jewish property to this murderer."

As well, Matar said, Arabs are permitted free passage all through Hebron, while Jews are prevented from leaving their own area.

The Women in Green have always said that Arafat has planned that as soon as the attention is off Hebron, he would turn his energies to Jerusalem. And that is what has happened, Matar said, in the Har Choma housing development in East Jerusalem.

Before Israel took Jerusalem in 1967, she explained, Jordan used the hills around the city to fire shells at the Jewish inhabitants. After 1967, "the Labor government realized that to protect a united Jerusalem, they had to make the hills part of the city."

They began to build a ring of settlements on the hills, including Talpiot, and the Hadassah Hospital on Mount Scopus.

"Har Homa is the last opening in that ring," she said, noting that it will be built mostly from property expropriated from Jews.

All the permits have been obtained, she said, and the High Court has ruled that it is legal to build.

The reason that Arafat is so opposed to Har Homa, she said, is that it is the nearest part of Bethlehem.

"Arafat is anxious to breach that opening, and have easy connection with the Arab community in East Jerusalem."

Matar charged that "Arafat is now emboldened to say that the first tractor will unleash a bloodbath. That is negotiation through threats — if we give in, there will be continual threats."

The same situation, she said, is taking place in Ras El Amud, an area near the Mount of Olives, next to the road going past the cemetery, land which was owned by Chabad over 100 years ago.

"They don't want us there either," she said. "It is a dangerous situation for Jerusalem if we cave in."

The situation in Jerusalem is no different than that under the previous government, Matar said, citing the existence of 20 Palestinian Authority ministries, contrary to the Oslo Accords, and the Mufti of Jerusalem inciting Arabs to kill Jews.

Conference planned for survivor generations

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust survivors, their children and their grandchildren are invited to a conference here March 12 to break through what one organizer calls the "silent secrets" of survivor families.

The day-long Institute for the Study of the Impact of the Holocaust on Survivor Generations, to be held at the Westin Harbor Castle, will look at survivors' trauma and how it is often transferred to their children and even grandchildren.

The workshop is part of the three-day annual meeting in Toronto of the American Orthopsychiatric Association. The conference will feature local experts in Holocaust-related trauma: John Sigal, a psychoanalyst and professor at McGill University; Andre Stein, author, University of Toronto professor and survivor; and Doris Epstein, a psychotherapist who has often worked with survivor families.

It will be chaired by Dr. Eva Metzger Brown, a clinical psychologist at the University of Massachusetts and herself a child survivor of the Holocaust.

Brown told The CJN in a telephone interview that one goal of the Holocaust seminar is to build bridges between professionals and survivors.

But it will mainly explore how trauma is often passed down, and how to break through the "pockets of silence" that often pervade survivor families.

Brown's own practice straddles general trauma — losses brought about by death or divorce — and dealing with the lasting anguish the Holocaust caused its survivors. She said it seemed plausible to her that the two should be brought together because of their "parallels."

"I can't imagine anyone having gone through the Holocaust, seeing people being shot and babies thrown against walls, not being traumatized at some level," she said.

That trauma has been well-documented. It often involves nightmares and fears of loss and separation, all of which "can lead to a sense of helplessness and a feeling that no one will believe you."

Brown likens Holocaust survivors' symptoms with those of survivors of sexual abuse.

And there's a need, she stressed, for children of survivors "to tell their story, to tell what it was like to be raised by survivors. We need them to speak out."

Members of the second and even third generations have been found to exhibit the same tendencies as those of survivors, Brown said. On the positive side, many have done well in life, spurred to succeed by survivors.

For details on how to register for the conference, call Brown at 413-256-8066, or e-mail her at [embrown@psych.umass.edu].

Survey finds Calgary Jews active, not very observant

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — The Calgary Jewish community is not a particularly observant one, but it is very active, with higher than average rates of synagogue membership and attendance at Jewish day schools. In addition, community members appear to be in agreement with the trend toward keeping a larger proportion of UJA dollars in Calgary to fund local needs.

These were among the preliminary findings of the Jewish Community Needs Assessment Survey, released recently. Included in the survey, which was sent out in the fall to 2,000 Jewish households in Calgary, were a series of questions about participation in Jewish life. In many ways the survey confirms what we already sense about ourselves as a community, said Daphne Taras, the University of Calgary professor who conducted the survey for Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC).

In a way, Taras said, "we operate like a village within a larger centre — our friends tend to be Jewish and there is a concentration of Jews in the southwest. Jews tend to cluster with other Jews despite the fact that professionally, we are well integrated. The survey itself can be seen as an indicator of the level of involvement. Of the 2,000 surveys mailed out, 680, or 32 percent, were returned in time to be included in the initial tabulations. An additional 80 surveys have since been returned and these responses will be factored into the final report.

According to CJCC president Nate Feldman, the response rate showed that "people in the community are concerned. They want to participate and that in itself is rewarding."

The preliminary results seem to indicate that in terms of the division of UJA dollars between local, national and international needs, CJCC is on track with community sentiment. Respondents to the survey indicated that they are comfortable with sending a smaller proportion of UJA funds to Israel than has been sent in the past.

Wide range of issues

In response to the question, "How would you allocate $1,000 that you donated to Calgary United Jewish Appeal only," respondents replied: Calgary (UJA member organizations; Camp BB, Calgary Jewish Centre, Akiva Academy, Calgary Jewish Academy, Community Council, Jewish Family Service): $625.21, Canadian National Jewish Organizations: $139.87; Israel (through United Israel Appeal): $234.92.

"It is clear that the community is on side with keeping more money in the community," said Feldman. "But it is also clear [that respondents] recognize our ongoing responsibility to support Israel."

The survey addressed a wide range of issues of interest to community planners — from usage patterns of various institutions, to priorities for funding. This information is expected to be of help in drawing up future plans for the community, in assessing whether needs are being met, and in establishing priorities.

However, the consensus is that it is premature to draw definitive conclusions. More analysis and further cross-tabulations are needed before the full significance of the survey can be determined.

Feldman feels the report provides community leadership with much food for thought. "The information presented is very interesting," he said, adding a warning. "But it has to be seen as information only. It provides the basis for some answers but it won't provide all the answers."

Both Marilyn Burke, chair of the Calgary Jewish Centre, and Mara Kline, co-president of Jewish Family Service, said that their boards will be looking at the findings very closely, with an eye to making adjustments in programming.

In presenting her report to the CJCC board, Taras expressed the view that the survey results are accurate because the mailing list was drawn up by CJCC, and included both contributors and non-contributors to UJA and members and non-members of the Jewish Centre.

Quebec court ruling leaves El Al 'in limbo'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The recent Quebec Superior Court ruling delaying — and possibly putting the kibosh on — plans to transfer international commercial flights from Mirabel Airport to Dorval has also left El Al "in limbo," says its Eastern Canada sales manager.

Regularly-scheduled Monday and Wednesday El Al flights to Israel from Mirabel will continue as they always have, Cohen stressed in an interview.

But like other international carriers, El Al planned to make its move to Dorval by the spring.

Because of the court ruling, El Al and other international carriers will not know whether they can relocate until it's decided once and for all whether the planned consolidation of domestic and international commercial flights to Dorval is a go.

Cohen said the delay has put just about everything related to the move on hold, ranging from scheduling to logistical operations that have to be coordinated and timed with precision and programmed into computers in a timely manner.

El Al had even hoped to move to Dorval earlier than other international carriers because the airline realized how convenient Dorval is for customers compared to Mirabel, which takes about twice as long to reach by car and which requires time-consuming transfers for travellers connecting from domestic to overseas flights.

Ironically, in business terms, there's been a silver lining for El Al stemming from the delay.

Air Canada was scheduled to launch Montreal to Tel Aviv flights in June, but has warned it might cancel plans to do so if it didn't hear by late last week whether the consolidation to Dorval would be taking place.

This, however, seemed very unlikely since an appeal of the Superior Court ruling by the Aéroports de Montréal (ADM), a non-profit corporation that manages Mirabel and Dorval airports and announced the planned move about a year ago, won't be heard until April 7.

Cohen acknowledged that if Air Canada carried through with its threat, El Al benefits because it would allow it to maintain its share of the local market.

But given the situation, Cohen said he would still like to see international commercial flights get off the ground from Dorval as soon as possible so as to benefit the public at large.

Jewish culture festival to return

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — KlezKanada, a celebration of Eastern European Jewish music and culture that drew almost 300 people from Canada and the United States to the Laurentians for its inauguration last year, will return this summer.

The format and content will be similar except that the event has been expanded to four days, from three, Aug. 20 to 24, and will again be held at Camp B'nai Brith in Lantier. This year's artists-in-residence will by the Klezmer Conservatory Band of Boston.

The band will be featured at a major outdoor concert the night of Aug. 23, to which the public at large is invited. KlezKanada chair, Dr. Hy Goldman, thinks 1,500 may turn out for the evening. Last year's concert with Brave Old World, another top U.S. klezmer band, drew 1,100.

The regular program will feature lectures, discussion groups, workshops in various instruments and voice, and smaller concerts, including a nightly KlezKanada Kabaret, led by noted scholars and musicians. Films, including some going back to the '20s, will be shown daily.

A theme of Three Cities of Yiddish Excellence: Lodz, Vilna and Warsaw will be explored through film, music and lectures by professors Robert Shapiro of Yeshiva University and Gershon Hundert of McGill University, as well as through an archival exhibition. The 100th anniversaries of The Forward, modern Zionism and the Jewish labor movement will also be observed.

Another highlight will be a panel discussion on Yiddish/Jewish Theatre Around the World, with such theatre personalities as Bernard Mendelovitch of London, Mina Bern and Broadway song-and-dance man Bruce Adler of New York, and Bryna Wasserman, director of Montreal's Yiddish Theatre.

Stage actors Mendelovitch and Bern will also appear together in a dramatic presentation.

Excerpts from the new New York musical Vilna hat a golem will be performed by Jeff Warschauer of New York and Deborah Strauss of Chicago, and New York singer Adrienne Cooper and pianist Zalman Mlotek will present excerpts from the their musical Music in Extremis: Songs from the Ghetto Theatres.

A nostalgic night is promised when Joe Borock of Philadelphia, one of the last great klezmer clarinetists of the '40s and '50s performs and talks with Hankus Netsky, musical director of the Klezmer Conservatory Band.

Among the other faculty confirmed to date are: Yiddish scholar Emanuel Goldsmith of New York, singer Shura Lipovsky of Amsterdam, New York impresario Moshe Rosenfeld and raconteur Michael Wex of Toronto.

Although there will be opportunities to brush up on one's Yiddish, English will be the main language of the sessions, Goldman said.

"The goal is not Yiddish immersion, but to enhance appreciation of the creativity that came out of Yiddish culture, something that is too great to simply be jettisoned."

Registration will be limited to 300 (200 on-site and 100 off-site), and accepted on a first come, first served basis, Goldman said.

Accommodations at the camp range from the retreat centre, which offers private rooms, down to ordinary cabins, with price scaled down accordingly. "The retreat has 112 beds, and we've already had requests from 170 people for them," he said.

KlezKanada is under the auspices of the Committee on Yiddish of the Jewish Education Council of Montreal.

Goldman is already thinking about the 1998 KlezKanada. That summer the International Association of Yiddish Clubs will hold its conference in Montreal, and some kind of joint programming is being considered.

For information on KlezKanada, call the Jewish Education Council, 345-2610.

Holocaust play real winner

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — A play about the Holocaust written and directed by two 17-year-old Parkside High School students in Dundas, was recently named the outstanding production at the local level of the province-wide Sears High School Drama Festival.

The play, Everyone has a Name, will now go on to the south-western Ontario regional festival in Windsor at the end of April, where 270 school plays will compete. Five will be chosen winners.

Alana Vertlieb and Niduk Wijayasingha, who wrote and directed Everyone Has A Name, received merit awards for writing and directing, and 15-year-old Samantha Waxman, who plays the leading role of Old Tzipora, received the excellence in acting award for her portrayal of an elderly survivor telling her story to her children.

This was the first win ever for Parkside High School where Vertlieb and Wijayasingha attend Grade 12 and Waxman is in Grade 10.

Tzipora's story is told in flashback, her recollection of a happy childhood with her brother and younger sisters and their beloved zayde interspersed with her memories of Auschwitz.

The three students say they were thrilled with their win, although neither Vertlieb nor Wijayasingha has writing or theatrical ambitions.

Vertlieb, however, a graduate of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy and participant of last year's March of the Living would like to teach about the Holocaust.

Waxman, also a former Hamilton Hebrew Academy student, hopes to go into theatre. She takes drama at Parkdale and has appeared in plays at summer camp and in public school.

There will be a repeat performance of Everyone Has Name at Westdale Collegiate in Hamilton on March 21 as well as two performances at Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue, one for students and another for March of the Living participants. The event is organized by March of the Living co-chair, Barbara Banks.

French museums to exhibit 900 works taken during war

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Four French museums have announced special exhibits of some 900 works of art that the Nazis took from France during World War II.

Some of the works might have been looted from Jews, and exhibit organizers say they hope that such pieces will be claimed by their rightful owners.

The exhibits — which include works by Picasso, Cezanne and Matisse — will open April 9 at the Louvre, the Musee d'Orsay, the Pompidou Centre and the Musee National de la Ceramique.

The event comes in the wake of a report by France's state-spending watchdog accusing the national museum network of having made little or no effort to return some 1,995 works of art that were entrusted to them shortly after the end of the war.

The museums were required by law to try to locate the owners or heirs of the art.

In addition, the French government recently announced that it would conduct a probe into Jewish property seized during World War II.

French Jewish leaders had been astonished at recent revelations that French national museums had failed to seek the rightful owners of the works

The 900 works will be displayed with a record of historical background that might help in locating their owners.

Some of the works are believed to have been seized from Jews who were deported to concentration camps or were fleeing persecution.

Israel strikes at Hezbollah

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli fighter planes struck Hezbollah targets in southern Lebanon last weekend in retaliation for earlier clashes that left one Israeli soldier dead and another seriously wounded.

Sgt. Lior Shabtai, 19, was killed and an officer was wounded last week when Hezbollah gunmen fired a missile at an Israeli tank.

Shabtai was buried in the military section of the cemetery in his hometown of Rishon leZion.

Last week's battle was a continuation of clashes of the previous night. During the exchanges, some 20 Hezbollah gunmen tried to overtake an Israeli position in the security zone.

At least four Hezbollah gunmen were killed, according to an army spokesperson.

During the battle, Hezbollah forces launched rockets and mortars at the Israeli position from a number of locations, some of them residential.

Israel later filed a complaint with the five-nation group monitoring the ceasefire that went into effect last April.

Ben-Ami, Beilin bid to lead Labor

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — MKs Yossi Beilin and Shlomo Ben-Ami submitted their candidacies for Labor's leadership at the party's headquarters on Hayarkon Street last Sunday, joining MKs Ehud Barak and Ephraim Sneh who have already done so.

At a press conference after handing in his candidacy forms, Beilin lashed out at Barak for "fudging and blunting" his positions to make them palatable for voters of various sectors and at the centre of the political map.

"It is unthinkable that Labor chooses a leadership candidate who doesn't make his positions clear, just because he claims he can win the elections. We should beware of repeating the mistake made in the election of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in choosing a man who loves to win," Beilin said.

He warned against trying to gain the support of the elusive political centre, which he called an optical illusion, since it disappears to the right come election day.

Ben-Ami, who also spoke to reporters after announcing his candidacy, said the Bar-On affair has exposed "a disgusting situation which endangers democracy, regardless of whether charges are pressed ultimately or not."

He said, "Israel is now in one of its most difficult hours, as its public integrity is on trial," indicating that Labor must lead in the campaign for public integrity.

Ben-Ami rejected proposals by Barak, Beilin and Sneh to remove his candidacy and form a coalition with them, in exchange for a key position.

He called for the restructure of Labor into a coalition of sectors and groups, to restore the party's lost social character and appeal. He said he will act to legislate free education for the ages of three to five and for academic studies.

IN THE BEAUTIFUL LAURENTIAN MOUNTAINS of QUEBEC

SOMETHING NEW at TREMBLANT!

Starting next June, L'Académie Tremblant will offer a french immersion camp for teenagers 14 to 17

Starting June 97, teens 14 to 17 years of age will have the opportunity to take part in a new interactive language camp. Doctor Michel Langlois, president and founder of L'Académie Tremblant, stresses the uniqueness of this innovative concept: a program combining academic teaching and outdoor activities.

Language learning will be enhanced by situational activities. A dynamic and educational approach that allows youngsters to get out of the classroom and on to the field. Students will have to demonstrate their ability to communicate in French by creating diversified workshops. A typical day will consist of three sessions, morning, afternoon and evening. For example, the youngsters could participate in a natural science project in the morning followed by sports activities in the afternoon and in the evening, they could present shows created and executed by them, thus demonstrating their know-how. Working on specific themes will help the youths to gradually integrate French.

For three weeks, the students will evolve in a totally French environment. Certified teachers from the academic milieu will ensure proper supervision. To complete their basic qualifications, these teachers will receive an additional training of 35 hours.

Cultural and sightseeing visits of the region are scheduled. Activities such as canoeing, sailing, trekking, mountain biking and camping are also on the program.

For three weeks, these youths will live according to the rhythm of this great mountain. They will have the opportunity to practice their communication skills and make new friends. Moreover, the proposed activities will surely put their sense of autonomy and responsibility to the rest. Nothing will be spared to make this experience unforgettable for the youths. A camp where learning will forever remain synonymous of pleasure.

IDF pullback on agenda

Likud critics of Netanyahu, such as MK Ze'ev Benjamin Begin, charge that the issue of "reciprocity" is not just being deferred but abandoned.

Despite the Hebron redeployment, the release of Palestinian women prisoners and the ensuing pullback, Israel has not received any dividends in return, Begin said.

During the next few days, Netanyahu will hold a series of consultations with security officials and ministerial colleagues regarding the scope of the pullback scheduled for this Friday.

Last month, Clinton asked Netanyahu to agree to a pullback that involves about 10 percent of the West Bank.

Aides to Netanyahu have intimated that most of the pullback will be transforming areas which currently have a status of shared Israeli-Palestinian control (Area B) and designating them as territories under complete Palestinian control (Area A). Palestinians, of course, would prefer to gain territory under total Israeli control (Area C). As it stands now, about three percent of the territories are Area A, about 27 percent are Area B and 70 are Area C.

Netanyahu was to visit Cairo this week to meet with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Next week he is to go to Russia to meet with President Boris Yeltsin as well as members of the Jewish community.

Meanwhile, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat was to make a three-day visit to the United States, which will take him from Washington where he will meet President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, to Texas where he will meet with former president George Bush and his secretary of state James Baker.

He will then fly to New York and meet with UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Arafat has maintained a volatile atmosphere in the West Bank while rejecting actual violence. Last weekend, the Palestinian Legislative Council called for a comprehensive strike to be held Monday to protest the Har Choma decision.

Trade visit wraps up

"On a personal note, I will always remember that Canada was one of the first countries in the world to fight for my release from a Soviet prison. The Canadians are true friends of Israel and the Jewish people," he added.

Eggleton told Sharansky "I am proud to be leading the largest and most prestigious group of Canadian business leaders ever to visit Israel. With the implementation of the free trade agreement we have started in a modest way with a solid foundation. It is clear from looking around at the variety of representatives in this room, many from some of Canada's leading companies, that the Canadian business community is eager to promote further trade and investments between our two countries."

At the conclusion of the lunch, the existing Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation agreement (CIIRDF) was extended for a further three years.

Israel and Canada agreed to continue to provide CIIRDF with $1 million a year from each country. As of June 1996, 12 projects had been approved representing almost $4 million in R&D cooperation in the fields of biotechnology and information technologies. This fund will encourage the small and medium-sized enterprises in both countries.

The Canadians were given many opportunities to make contacts on behalf of their firms with potential Israeli clients and agents. A similar mission from Israel to Canada, to be led by Sharansky, is slated to take place later in the year.

The theme of closer bilateral trade was repeated by Dan Propper, chair of the Manufacturers Association of Israel (MIA), at a MAI business breakfast in Tel Aviv in honor of the visit of Eggleton and his mission.

Over the next few years more than $25 billion (US) will be invested in the Middle East region, Propper said. He wanted to encourage the Canadians to do business with the Palestinians and Jordanians by investing in new industrial parks, such as the ones being built near Gaza and near the Sheik Hussein Bridge on the River Jordan.

The meeting ended with Eggleton witnessing the signing of a cooperation agreement between the MAI, signed by Propper, and the Alliance of Manufacturers and Exporters of Canada, signed by the Alliance chair Harry Shelson.

Eggleton also held a short meeting with a Palestinian business delegation in Ramallah and inaugurated the first Israeli franchise in downtown Jerusalem of The Second Cup.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 24

• Israel sent one ton of medical supplies to Bulgaria in response to published reports of shortages in Bulgarian hospitals.

• A Tel Aviv court released details of the arrest of a Soviet spy during the 1980s. Roman Weisfeld, an electrical engineer who immigrated to Israel in 1980, was convicted nine years later of spying for the former Soviet Union and sentenced to 15 years in prison.

Feb. 25

• One Palestinian was killed and three others were wounded in clashes with Israeli soldiers in Hizme, an Arab village north of Jerusalem.

• Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai held talks with the visiting Turkish chief of staff and pledged that the two countries would continue to improve military ties.

Feb. 26

• Court-appointed psychiatrists concluded that Noam Friedman was mentally unstable at the time he opened fire on Palestinians in the Hebron market. The military court ordered Friedman be committed to a psychiatric hospital.

•Israel's High Court of Justice refused to release six Iraqi citizens held in Israeli jails for the past three years. The court said the Iraqis could pose a threat to security.

Feb. 27

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk to discuss the plan to build housing on Har Choma.

• Israel deported a Palestinian terrorist to Syria. The terrorist, Basem Ghanem, was captured in 1987 before he was able to take hostages.

• The permit to build on Har Choma was signed after the High Court postponed a petition to prevent construction on the site.

Feb. 28

• The IDF and the police were placed on high alert around Jerusalem as a precaution due to the signing of the building permit for Har Choma.

Redeployment starting

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

It took Israel and the PLO three months to hammer out the modified Jan. 15 Hebron redeployment agreement, which orignally should have been implemented long before.

One of the reasons for the delay was that the PLO lacked trust in Israel's intentions. The Palestinians would not sign on the dotted line until Israel promised to undertake three further withdrawals from the West Bank, as called for in the Oslo peace process.

The negotiations were arduous, taxing the patience of U.S. intermediary Dennis Ross, but finally the two sides reached an understanding under which Israel's third redeployment would occur no later than August 1998.

The first of these redeployments is scheduled to take place this week. But already a controversy is brewing, turning on the depth of the planned withdrawals.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu maintains that the size of the areas to be allocated to the Palestinians is clearly an Israeli responsibility, subject to its security requirements.

His interpretation, sharply disputed by the Palestinians, is supported by the opposition Labor party and by the United States.

When Israel and the PLO were negotiating the terms of the 1993 Declaration of Principles — the foundation stone of the Oslo accords — the Palestinians demanded that at least three-quarters of the West Bank should be vacated by the third withdrawal. According to Uri Savir, one of the chief Israeli negotiators and a Labor party appointee, Israel balked.

The redeployments, perhaps with the exception of the third and final one, would be determined solely by Israel, and would not be spelled out in advance, he recalled.

The U.S. government has taken a similar position. In a side letter to the Hebron agreement, Warren Christopher, the then secretary of state, advised PLO chairman Yasser Arafat that Israel should redeploy its forces to "specified military locations" in the West Bank. This view has since been echoed by Ross and the American ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk.

The Palestinians, however, point to a passage in Christopher's letter which states that the "secure and defensible borders" to which Israel is entitled should be the outcome of bilateral talks. Israel counters that this passage refers, not to the three redeployments, but to the permanent status discussions due to begin shortly. These will focus on, among other things, final borders, security arrangements and Palestinian refugees.

By all accounts, Israel intends to yield a minimal amount of territory in the first pullback, as little as two percent or as much as 10 percent (to compensate the Palestinians for Israel's decision to build the new Har Choma neighborhood in east Jerusalem). The Palestinians expect to gain upwards of 80 percent of the West Bank when the third redeployment is completed, but they are probably deluding themselves. They already completely control three percent of Area A, comprising the major Arab towns, and share with Israel about 27 percent of Area B.

Their goal is to acquire enough contiguous land to establish an independent Palestinian state. The Palestinians do not believe that their objective of wresting most of the West Bank (and the Gaza Strip) from Israel is excessive.

As the PLO never tires of proclaiming, the West Bank and Gaza form less than 25 percent of the Palestinians' historic homeland, which some Palestinian factions, such as Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine: General Command, still covet in its entirety.

Israel, of course, has its own territorial demands. The Labor party is more flexible than the Likud with respect to giving up land in exchange for peace. But there is a growing consensus that Israel should annex eastern Jerusalem and the adjacent Gush Etzion bloc, widen the coastal strip and thus incorporate parts of Samaria closest to the old Green Line, and retain a military presence along the Jordan River. Clearly, tough negotiations lie ahead.

Assessing Cairo's cold peace

By JACK SILVERSTONE
Special to The CJN

CAIRO — The first memorable sight on the broad boulevard in from Cairo airport is a large frieze portraying the Egyptian crossing of the Suez Canal in the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Discerning whether the option of war between Egypt and Israel is now firmly consigned to history and public statues, was one of the principal objectives of a 36-hour visit to the most populous Arab country of 62 million by a Canadian delegation representing the Canada-Israel Committee, B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress.

During an intensive day of meetings organized by the Canadian embassy in Cairo and led by Ambassador Michael Bell who accompanied the delegation, an uninterrupted stream of high-level officials and business leaders assured the delegation that the peace between Israel and Egypt was irreversible.

They were convincing, but Israelis are worried by the state of relations between the two countries marked more by an absence of hostilities than by deep bilateral ties.

After 18 years of peace, Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak has yet to pay an official visit to Israel; the flow of tourist visits is markedly uneven, with few Egyptians visiting Israel; the bilateral trade figures are one-sided; and Egyptian intellectuals are mostly anti-Israel. The arrest of an Israeli Druze working in Egypt on charges of spying, vehemently denied by Israel, has further strained relations. But what is probably the most troubling is the unrelenting anti-Israel invective in the Egyptian press, which often spills over into outright anti-Semitism.

Invariably the Egyptian response, when pressed by the Canadian delegation on the media-coverage issue, was to blame the so-called opposition press, referring to newspapers belonging to Islamic or Nasserist parties. However, it was a major government-oriented daily which recently published and then, after Israeli and international protest, retracted, a baseless and outrageous story that Israeli doctors had injected hundreds of Palestinians with AIDS.

The president of the powerful Council of Egyptian Industries, Ibrahim Kamel, met top Israeli leaders, including Benjamin Netanyahu, during a recent visit to Israel. He was optimistic about long-term Israeli-Egyptian relations but expressed doubt about the possibility of speeding up the process.

Media vitriol

Current two-way trade amounts to some $350 million, of which Egyptian oil exports to Israel account for about $200 million. These figures, which are regarded as paltry by the Israelis, were cited by Dr. Sallama Shaker, the senior official in the Egyptian foreign office responsible for Canadian affairs, as one example of the satisfactory state of bilateral relations.

While acknowledging the problem of media vitriol against Israel, she denied the government's ability to control it, contrary to Israeli assertions, and argued that it was a two-way street. She condemned attacks on the Egyptian role in the peace process, whether they come from Israeli sources or from Jews in the Diaspora.

Asserting an indispensable and pre-eminent Egyptian role as the leader of the Arab world in the peace process was Nabil Fahmy, chief political counsellor to the foreign minister. He was a leading figure in advising the Palestinian Authority on the recently concluded negotiations concerning Hebron. Fahmy spoke of Egypt's invaluable efforts in reaching the agreement on Hebron and rejected any suggestion that his country might have played a spoiler role in the protracted bargaining. He said that "with the Hebron accord, the door to peace has been unlocked." When asked about the violence in the Palestinian areas last autumn, he stated that a renewal of hostilities is not in the interests of the Palestinian Authority.

Fahmy expressed no doubts about the current Israeli government's desire for peace. He said, however, that it cannot be attained by trying to sidestep the only peace process available, namely the Oslo Accords. Any retreat from territorial concessions was a reversion not only to pre-Oslo but also to pre-Madrid concepts.

As for the tiny remnant of the once grand Egyptian-Jewish community of some 300,000, they are now mostly aged and deeply concerned about preserving the deteriorating cemeteries and synagogues, mostly in Cairo and Alexandria, some of which have been declared historic sights. The one remaining Jewish house of worship in Port Said was sold and demolished. The entire community consists of around 250 souls and has no role in national or regional politics.

The commitment of Egypt to peaceful relations with its neighbors to the east, as expressed to us by political leaders, their officials and the business sector seemed sincere. They seek stability and security, both internally and regionally.

But likely no less sincere are the intelligentsia, the media and the political extremes, who have exhibited little but unmitigated anger over the continued success of the Zionist enterprise.

This schizophrenic attitude toward Israel in Egyptian society is to be found even in the person of the deputy prime minister, Youssef Wally, who is considered one of the most pro-Israel ministers in the government.

He noted with pride the frequent visits of his officials to Israel, although he himself has never visited and has no plans to do so, saying that what is important is believing in good relations and not necessarily exchanging visits. So the Israeli desire for tangible symbols appears frustrated even by this friendly senior statesman, who unhesitatingly said that "peace, by hook or by crook, will dominate the region."

As for the official Canadian perspective, Bell, who prior to his Cairo assignment was Canada's top envoy in Israel and Jordan, was upbeat after the Hebron deal. The ambassador termed it an "important success."

Jack Silverstone, National Executive Director and General Counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, is currently on a study leave in Israel.

Fitness trainer urges three-way approach to wellness

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Are there many resolutions that are broken as often as the one to get physically fit?

You buy a treadmill, join a health club, or get a jogging suit but soon the treadmill becomes an excellent place to sort laundry, the health club is just too far away, and the jogging suit is great to wear when watching TV.

Enter Jennifer Salter, a certified personal trainer who comes to your home or office to arrange an exercise program and counsel you on lifestyle changes.

"Exercise, eating a low-fat healthy diet and stress management are combined in my philosophy of wellness," she told The CJN in a recent interview.

Salter is certified by the American Council on Exercise (ACE), a member of the International Association of Fitness Professionals and a member of the National Strength and Conditioning Association.

As well, she has a BA in psychology from York University and a master of social work from the University of Toronto.

It is extremely important she says, that a trainer be properly trained. "Otherwise, you don't know if they understand anatomy, kinesiology and biomechanics, and how to program safe activities for different health issues."

Many people have had negative experiences with exercise programs, and part of Salter's job, she says, is to help overcome that.

Body image counselling is an important part of the "wellness puzzle" as she describes it, noting that many women have a false notion of what they really look like.

Stress management is another factor, she says. "Pure exercise can help people manage stress, but there are often other issues involved."

Salter begins by setting up a consultation, "so [clients] can get a sense of me, decide if they want to work with me, and discuss health concerns, such as high cholesterol, high blood pressure, sports injuries, or back problems."

She completes a health history form and men over 40, women over 50 and anyone with health problems must obtain a physician's release.

Sessions cost $50 each and take place from one to five times a week, depending on how motivated a person is to work on their own. "Of course, part of my job is to keep them motivated," she adds.

Personal fitness trainer Jennifer Salter demonstrates proper techniques for doing sit-ups to client Bill Windrem. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

The key to Salter's program is planning and maintaining a balance between three types of training; cardiovascular fitness, strength training (with weights, for instance) and flexibility.

She also teaches people how to exercise properly. "It is easy to make mistakes, she says, such as using the back instead of the legs to lift weights, or performing certain movements that put the shoulder in danger.

"You can't do just one thing," she stresses. "Eating healthy is important, but if you don't exercise, you are still at risk — not as much, maybe, but you are still at a higher risk than someone who eats well and exercises."

Quoting a recent U.S. Surgeon-General's report on physical activity, she says a lifetime of inactivity is equivalent to smoking a pack of cigarettes a day.

Exercise has a myriad of benefits: a decrease in breast cancer in women, and a lower risk of colorectal, lung and digestive system cancers, she says.

"A study by the [U.S.] Cooper Institute of Aerobics Research, showed that in a study of 10,000 men, there was a 44 percent decrease in the risk of early death from coronary heart disease, diabetes, hypertension, stroke and cancers for those who exercise"

Exercise can be intimidating for those who are new at it, she acknowledges. It is not necessary to have fancy equipment or an exercise room in one's house, Salter says, explaining that she carries equipment such as stability balls in her car. However, if people intend to carry on seriously, she advises them to get what they need, especially weights.

New fellowships at Baycrest

TORONTO — Baycrest has been chosen by the Ontario Mental Health Foundation as its first partner in an innovative funding program to train mental health researchers in Ontario.

In an unusual type of collaboration, the organization will pool their resources to establish two post-doctoral fellowships at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute. It is the first step in a new initiative to channel training funds through institutions as well as through grants to individuals.

"We chose Baycrest as the pilot site for this program because of its interdisciplinary mental health focus and the close link which exists there between research and clinical practice," says Dr. Howard Cappell, executive director of the Ontario Mental Health Foundation. "Also important are the Rotman Research Institute's strong commitment to training and the number of outstanding scientists who are available to act as mentors to students."

"These students will have the opportunity to work on basic science that can be applied through Baycrest's clinical services, thus adding to our understanding of the elderly and leading to better treatments," says Dr. Donald Stuss, director of the Rotman Research Institute. "They will also work on state-of-the art technology used in brain research. By collaborating on this type of educational opportunity, the foundation and our institute are ensuring that Ontario's young scientists are well trained to compete in today's world."

The Big Oak Tree

By Tamara Kathryn Smith

Judaism is a big oak tree and I am proud to be a leaf.

Every single leaf is an important part of the tree.

Learning Jewish things prevents the leaves from wilting.

If too many leaves wilt and fall the tree won't survive.

I am valuable to the tree so please teach me all you can.

I am 10 years old and in Grade 4 at Waverley Public School, Bowmanville, Ont. Sometimes it is lonely being Jewish in a small town, as I don't know any other Jewish children.

I want to travel to Jewish communities in Canada and meet other Jewish people. I would like to learn more about the Holocaust so that I may teach other children through school presentations.

I am trying my best to learn all I can about being Jewish and to help others. Please care about me and help me learn many Jewish things.

Thank to Naamah, Noah's wife, the plants of the world are saved

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Everyone knows that when G-d was going to destroy the world in the flood, He commanded Noah to build an ark, and to bring into it two of every animal on the earth.

But what about Noah's wife, Naamah?

According to Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, in her beautiful new book A Prayer for the Earth; the story of Naamah, Noah's Wife, (Jewish Lights, 1996), Naamah was asked to "gather the seeds of all the flowers and all the trees" and make a garden in the ark, so that all the living things of the earth would be saved, not just the animals.

Naamah went all through the world, gathering seeds from flowers, spices, vegetables, and fruits, planted them in clay pots and took them to the ark.

She pretended not to notice dandelions, but G-d ordered her to gather their seeds too. Sasso explained that to make them feel better, G-d made certain that dandelions would cover the earth.

Life was very hard in the ark, but whenever things got too much for Noah and Naamah they would "breathe the sweet aroma of the flowers and sit in the quiet of the plants that they called Naamah's garden."

And when the rains stopped and the water finally went away, Naamah planted all her seeds and the world was full of color and life again.

The pictures in A Prayer for the Earth, which were done by Bethanne Anderson, are delightful, full of bright colors. She must have had fun drawing the animals in the ark — when the ark starts pitching from the flood, the mane of the lion turns green!

You will especially like this book if you enjoy nature and growing things — but don't most of us?

Hank's Diner & Ballroom, a balance of fun and formal

Planning a bar or bat mitzvah? Looking for a locale with the right balance of elegance and relaxation: formal enough to impart respect for a special event, and relaxed enough to encourage everyone to have fun? Or maybe you just want a place to dine out, with good food, good service and a touch of nostalgia in the atmosphere. In either case, Hank's Diner & Ballroom is the place for you.

In business for 12 years, Hank's has a reputation for committed, conscientious service at affordable prices. With decor reminiscent of the '50's and '60's, old-style booths and posters of Elvis and James Dean, the Diner is formal, but fun; the Ballroom can be decorated according to your wishes.

Hank's hosts Sweet 16's and engagement parties as well as Bar and Bat Mitzvahs, offering a complete dining, entertainment and decor party package. Under one roof, Hank's helps select your menu, does in-house catering, books your DJ, designs your centrepieces and balloon decor, and co-ordinates your colours. (Outside catering is also available.)

The menu is versatile: everything from chicken fingers and fries for kids to formal dinners for adults. Our Herb Garlic Salmon is mouth-watering and our Mediterranean Chicken Breast is talked about for days after the party. Add service and decor, and you have a recipe that guarantees satisfied customers — and explains Hank's mile-long list of testimonials.

You've already heard this, though, from your neighbours. What Hank's really wants to tell you about is the 1997 Annual Price Sell Off. Prices start as low as $15.95 per person Monday—Friday, $19.95 Saturdays and Sundays. And there's more: book your 1998 party now, and use the coupon from the ad for an additional $100 off.

And that's not all: on Tuesday, April 8, at 7:30 p.m., Hank's is hosting an Open House. This will be a party in its own right, with DJ, hors d'oeuvres and decoration, so you'll see how the ballroom looks during a simcha. The staff look forward to meeting you.

Hank's Diner & Ballroom are located at 10 Alden Road in Markham, one block east of Woodbine and John. Call Hank's catering hot line now: 905-474-9930.

Sable et Or: gilt-edged suit salon is glowing addition to Yorkville

A new Yorkville boutique as compellingly unusual as its name has added an exciting new dimension to buying ladies' suits.

Sable et Or, French for "sand and gold", beckons you into a stunning salon of sandy golds, yellow pastels and gleaming maple floors. Awash with light even on a rainy day, it's home to the hand-sewn suits created by French designer Annie Dantheny. These exquisite garments — to which Sable et Or has exclusive North American rights — are distinctively different from the run-of-the-mill. A boon to professional women, they are impeccably fabricated in pure wool, pure linen, Thai silk, and high-quality viscose.

Because the shop caters to an international clientele, the emphasis is on year-round wear. Though you'll certainly find whatever you need for spring, there's always a selection of transitional garments. At any given time, you'll see over 50 Dantheny designs in French sizes 36 to 50, for every season and occasion from conference to cocktail, in a rainbow of colors: gentle pastels; warm, upbeat hues for fun times; the more demure tones of the business world; and the deep blues and blacks of traditional evening wear.

For the younger woman, there are designs by Bestini and Allumette; you'll even find something here for your children. While 80% of the garments are by Dantheny, proprietor Daisy Bryniak keeps her eyes open for one-of-a-kind items — including the knickknacks and fragrances which give Sable et Or some of its special atmosphere.

Here, the keyword is service. Ms. Bryniak, who designed the entire store herself — including elaborate floral decorations and elegant wrought-iron furniture — will assist you in mixing and matching colors and even buttons. You can also order any suit in any season, with a waiting period of four weeks. All alterations are included in the price, for as long as you own the suit; and whenever the garment is altered, Sable et Or will have it dry cleaned for you at no extra charge. Daisy is also happy to assist you in wardrobe planning, a facet of the business that allows her to express her design talents and indulge her love of working with people.

Ms. Bryniak travels to Paris every two months, to do her purchasing and oversee special orders in person.

At 162 Cumberland St. on the north side, three doors from the Four Seasons Hotel, Sable et Or is open seven days a week: Monday to Friday 10:30 to 6:30, Saturdays 10:30 to 6:00, and Sundays 1:00 to 5:00. If other times fit your schedule better, feel free to call for an appointment: (416) 922-3684. Sable et Or accepts all major credit cards and Interac.

Party planning with the best!

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant for 15 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 4 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 50 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Tuesday, April 1, 1997 at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St., in North York. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 11 p.m. Once again, as in past years, at 8:30 p.m. Ines Di Santo, designer/owner of Chez Moi Fashions will present her '97 collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, featuring bridal, evening wear and bat mitzvah creations.

"There are a lot of bridal trade shows offered to the public," says Kay. "The Celebration of Stars Show" is geared solely to the Jewish community. All of the exhibitors rely on Jewish simchas for the core of their business."

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. You have the luxury of making an instant decision based on what you have seen, heard or tasted, or mull it over and decide at a later date. Many of the exhibitors will be offering show discounts and numerous give-aways. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, calligraphy, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and even alternative entertainment for your guests such as virtual reality. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proved to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information you can contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

Na'amat

An Organization Founded by Women of the Twenties
For Women of the Twenty-First Century

We shared Golda's ideals then...

Golda Meir (Na'amat President 1932 to 1934) is pictured (middle row 2nd from right) in Toronto in 1925 with members of Toronto's Club One.

We carry on Golda's ideals today...

Members of Toronto Na'amat leadership meet in Jerusalem as they continue to build Golda's dream of full equality for women.

Founded in 1925 by Golda Meir (former Prime Minister of Israel), Rachel Yanait Ben Zvi (Israel's first First Lady), and other dynamic young women of Israel's pioneer era, Na'amat has always aspired to achieve women's highest goals.

Did you know?

NA'AMAT is Israel's largest women's organization, with 350,000 members.

NA'AMAT has branches in 14 countries around the world with 3500 members across Canada.

NA'AMAT Israel operates 837 day care centres caring for 25,000 children...gives residential care to traumatized children who cannot be placed in foster homes...runs 14 vocational high schools and two residential agricultural high schools for older children who need more than the regular school system can provide.

NA'AMAT Toronto co-founded and actively supports the Bialik Hebrew Day School ... Habonim Dror Youth Movement ...Camp Gesher.

They were decades ahead of their time.
They wanted to stand
Shoulder to shoulder with the men,
As equals
So they founded... Na'amat!
To fight for women's rights, status and dignity
To strive for an equal place in society
To create the best lives for their families
To care for the children.

NA'AMAT Israel's Legal Department has thirty branches throughout the country, staffed with lawyers who help abused women, widows, single parents, women with financial or estate problems, and Agunot (women seeking a Get – a Jewish divorce).

NA'AMAT Toronto runs a free legal advisory clinic for women with similar problems.

NA'AMAT Israel's five Centres for the Prevention of Violence in the Family have aided over 4,000 women victims. NA'AMAT's new shelter and counselling centre in Tel Aviv for women victims and their children is a model of its kind.

NA'AMAT Toronto is carrying out a programme of awareness education for victims of domestic violence that include workshops and wide distribution of their resource guide, "I Can't Believe It's Happening..."

NA'AMAT Israel provides both emotional and legal support for Agunot and is making unstinting efforts to convince both the Knesset and the Beth Din to change the unfair laws that make these women suffer.

NA'AMAT Toronto helps organize and lead the Vigil for Agunot that is held annually on the Fast of Esther.

Munch's art reveals modern man's inner conflict

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A major exhibition of the works of Norwegian artist Edvard Munch (1863-1944), opened last week at the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO).

The exhibition of the world-famous painting, The Scream (1893), one of three oil versions known to exist, will coincide with the exhibition, Edvard Munch: Symbolist Prints, from the Vivian and David Campbell Collection.

Munch was a painter and printmaker who explored all the aspects of life and revealed modern man's inner conflicts — tragedy, intense and dramatic love affairs, beauty, abandonment, agony and death.

The oil painting The Scream, which is on loan to the AGO from the Munch Museum of Oslo, Norway, will be on exhibition until April 20. It has been used in popular culture to express social and political commentary and is the most reproduced work of art after the Mona Lisa, notes Michael Park-Taylor, associate curator of European Art at the AGO.

The 58 symbolist woodcuts, etchings and lithographs from the Campbell collection including The Kiss, Vampire, Madonna and The Sick Child, and an oil painting titled Girls on the Jetty (c.1903) can be viewed until May 25.

Approximately 25 related lithographs of The Scream exist, five at the Munich Museum, five in public collections and the others are held privately. One of these lithographs titled, The Geshrei (The Cry), is included in the Campbells' collection and will be on view during the exhibition. David explained that each of Munch's works is different, for the artist would stop, make changes and then continue.

The Campbells began collecting Munch's works in 1964, two years after the Munch Museum opened in Norway. David told The CJN at a preview of the exhibition that while they were on a trip to Norway, "My wife recognized what a genius Munch was — and she opened a new world for us."

Vivian says, "You can't just look at Munch's art, you must stop and see what he is trying to say — he reflects all the emotions of man." She notes that her favorite is a self-portrait of the artist.

The Campbells' Munch collection is the largest and finest in Canada and the third largest in North America. They are among Toronto's leading supporters of the visual and performing arts, Park-Taylor says.

Park-Taylor, who describes Munch as "the greatest print maker of all time," has been working on the preparations for the exhibition for three years. He says, "Munch was incredibly experimental and speaks to our time. Most artists are anecdotal or narrative but Munch melds them together and creates a universal image."

Maxwell L. Anderson, AGO's director says, "We are grateful to the Munch Museum for its generosity in lending us The Scream and to Vivian and David Campbell for their efforts in securing the loan. This icon of 20th century art commands unrivaled global fascination and the scholarship behind our exhibition provides penetrating insight into its origins and persistent aura for audiences everywhere."

Canada/PA trade agreement?

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Canada is likely to sign a free trade agreement with the Palestinian Authority in May, Canadian International Trade Minister Art Eggleton told the Jerusalem Post last Tuesday. This would bring trade relations between the two in line with those between Canada and Israel.

"The major principles of the agreement have been concluded," said Eggleton. "However, I must point out, you can sign an agreement, but it is the business communities that will have to carry out their contracts and increase trade."

Cowbunga! Paintings hit home

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Chip (Grafstein) Feldman grew up with seven sisters and a brother in a big house with a wraparound veranda at 70 Brunswick Ave. in Toronto. Her father, Moishe Grafstein, had a silk and wool store on College Street near Spadina.

In the house on Brunswick were a golden harp, a grand piano, a violin, a xylophone, an accordion, assorted brass and woodwinds and a set of drums. The Grafstein daughters formed their own all-girl orchestra, performing at concerts and community events.

Moishe Grafstein, open hearted, flamboyant, brought home a stream of visitors from the store, the street, the neighborhood, for a good dinner cooked by his wife Goldie. They stayed for an hour, overnight, a week, a month, even years. The front door was never locked and everyone was welcome.

It's not surprising that Feldman, who studied art at Central Technical School, projects the warmth of that lively household in her works at a solo exhibition March 3 to 28 in the Grosvenor Room (second floor restaurant) at the Metro Central YMCA, 20 Grosvenor St. just west of Yonge.

Feldman, who has lived in St. Catharines since her marriage in 1948, frequently reaches back to her roots and has painted 70 Brunswick, her father's store and scenes from Kensington the way it was.

She also focuses on the joys of childhood. Her painting Cowbunga! pulses with the exhilaration of two youngsters zooming down a snow-covered hill on a flying saucer. Tagalong illuminates children romping in a park with some frisky Dalmatian puppies. Both paintings are in her current show.

Feldman's art is sometimes labelled naive, perhaps because the colors are bright, the figures direct. A better description would be honest. This is a skilled artist with the ability to make a straightforward, happy statement.

Swoosh!, an acrylic collage by Chip Feldman.

Feldman works in oils, acrylic, acrylic and collage, water colors.

Her water colors are strong. Red Hot Peppers are just that and her floral; Four O'Clocks are brilliant yellow.

She has a penchant for the whimsical. Song to the Evening Star presents a full complement of 85 symphony musicians, some quite conspicuous, like the man who winces when his neighbor hits a sour note, or the ponytailed individual sporting an earring and Adidas. The conductor bears a striking resemblance to lawyer Eddie Greenspan.

The Card Game and the Kibbitzers takes an amused look at the human condition as three men seated at a picnic table try to concentrate on their game while ignoring intrusive spectators.

Feldman has earned awards at the Molson Art Show, Garden City Art Show, Rodman Hall and Folk Arts Festival. Her oil painting, Light in the Window, was chosen to travel with the Canadian Council of Women's Centennial Art Exhibit, showcased across Canada for six months.

She has had 17 one-woman shows in St. Catharines, Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal.

Her commissions include a 14-foot x 20-foot mural at Sheridan Mall, a painting for Mohammed Ali and a collection of paintings created for the musical, The Me Nobody Knows, at Toronto's Crest Theatre.

Her works are found in collections at Niagara Structural Steel, Newman Steel, Heintzman Piano, Bayview Country Club, Niagara Public Library.

Hours for the Grosvenor Room exhibition are 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. weekdays.

Drawn From Memory settles old scores

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An unexamined life is not worth living, Paul Fierlinger observes as Drawn From Memory, the Toronto Jewish Film Society's latest offering, gets rolling.

Fierlinger is true to his word. He spares no one, including himself, in this feature, scheduled to be screened on March 9 at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackson Hall at 7:30 p.m.

It could be said that Drawn From Memory, a mix of animation, photographs and charcoal and pencil sketches, is basically a father-son story as well as a settling of scores.

Fierlinger, a Czech Jew, clearly disliked his father, a diplomat. The elder Fierlinger, who died in 1967, was a preoccupied and self-absorbed man who seems to have considered his son a nuisance. Fierlinger has neither forgotten nor, it would appear, forgiven him for his indifference.

Drawn From Memory, which had its premiere at the 1995 Sundance Festival in the United States, unfolds in chronological order.

Fierlinger was born in 1936 in Japan, where his father served as a commercial attache. Transferred to to New York City in 1939, the Fierlingers spent the war years in the United States.

Young Fierlinger was happy there, despite being shuttled to a succession of boarding schools and foster homes. In these places, however, he learned to love America.

In the summer of 1945, Fierlinger's parents returned to Czechoslovakia. He joined them a year later. His father attained prominence in the Communist government, whose prime minister, Zdanek, was Fierlinger's uncle.

Fierlinger's parents, members of the country's elite, belonged to the so-called "black limousine set." Fierlinger satirizes their hypocrisy mercilessly.

Much to their distress, he did not fit into the new scheme of things. He disliked the private school in which he was enrolled. (His roommates were Vaclav Havel, the current president of the Czech Republic, and Milos Forman, the movie director). He had difficulty with the Czech language. He was not enamored of the regime. He refused to take advantage of his position in society, becoming an apprentice coal miner, a bohemian and, finally, a freelance cartoonist under the name of Pavel Fala.

With his mother's death, Fierlinger made plans to escape. He had always dreamed of returning to the West and living in a democracy. In 1967, a year before the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, he moved to Holland and then to the United States.

Drawn From Memory, a pungent, coming-of-age film, recounts these memories with elan.

Gottfried both funny and tasteless

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — American comedian Gilbert Gottfried, whose most celebrated role was the voice of the parrot in the Disney movie Aladdin, brought his quirky brand of stand-up humor to Canada recently for two sold-out shows at Yuk Yuk's Comedy Superclub, as part of the Toronto Comedy Festival.

Gottfried responds to the audience's welcoming applause by pleading with his listeners not to get out of control, "because you'll poke someone's eye out." Thus begins an hour-long stream-of-consciousness comic monologue that is devastatingly funny, occasionally shocking and irredeemably tasteless at times.

Asked once what goes through his mind when he's on stage, Gottfried replied, "Everything. The Holocaust... my laundry... whether waxed or unwaxed dental floss is better... whether the mint flavor on toothpicks is poisonous... how many bristles are in a hairbrush."

Although it is disconcerting to hear mundane subjects discussed between references to mass murder, there seems to be method to Gottfried's madness. A child of survivors, he seems to be implying that the Holocaust and other modern atrocities, besides brutalizing millions of victims, have desensitized the rest of us into a callous numbness.

Strangely, his monologue is peppered with references to things that occurred 25 years ago or more, including the moon landing, the movie Planet Of The Apes and the TV show Hogan's Heroes.

Modern references like the following pop up only sporadically: "I was so happy that O.J. has the kids now," he announces, with typical razor-sharp irony. "I think he'll be a good father. If you have O.J. as a father, when he tells you to do your homework, you do it."

The Jews are a favorite sacred cow of Gottfried's. For instance, he satirizes the way "Jews have to announce everything. If you're Jewish, you can't keep anything in your head. If you drink a glass of water, you say, 'Oh, this is good water. Before I was thirsty, but now I'm not.'

"You could put a Jew in the desert, all alone. He'd say, 'Gee, it's hot in here. Look at all this sand! Who needs so much sand?'"

There's more than something nerdish about the way Gottfried repeatedly grips his head on stage. The pose evokes a hysteria reminiscent of the figure in The Scream, the famous Eduard Munch drawing now in Toronto. With his rich trademark voice, Gottfried tramples on our deepest fears and sensitivities as he delivers stand-up comedy for the post-Holocaust era.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Jewish Folk Choir Seeks Voices

Slated to perform its annual spring concert May 11 and at a festival in Ottawa in July, the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir is seeking a few experienced choral singers, particularly tenors. The repertoire features works old and new, traditional and modern, mainly in Yiddish, but also in English, Hebrew and Ladino. Included are well-known chassidic songs, a Yiddish oratorio on the poem Tzvei Brider by I. L. Peretz, and works by Jewish-Canadian composers Milton Barnes, John Weinzweig, Louis Applebaum, Ben Steinberg and Alexander Rapaport.

Led by conductor Esther Ghan Firestone, the choir rehearses Wednesdays at 7:30 pm, Morris Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. 416-778-8878.

The Play's The Thing

• My Mother's Courage, a black comedy by award-winning Hungarian-Jewish playwright George Tabori previews March 13 and opens March 14 at Theatre Passe Muraille. Walking a tightrope between tragedy and comedy, the play tells the story of the summer day in 1944 when Tabori's mother, a Budapest resident on her way to a card game, is arrested, put on a train to be deported — and then escapes. Until March 30. 416-504-7529.

• Driven Sane, an "autobiographical journey from pain to liberation" written, directed and performed by Justin Thomas, tells of the author's battle to overcome the effects of early childhood abuse; it contains some Jewish content. Thomas' fans include Mel Lastman, Princess Diana, Jack Lemmon and Federico Fellini. Held over at the Manulife Centre, Studio Suite 4912 (Bay & Bloor), Toronto. Adults $18. 416-969-7667.

Film Notes

•Len Blum, Toronto-based scriptwriter, has been jetting back and forth to New York for various public relations activities associated with Private Parts, the film he scripted for Paramount based on Howard Stern's scatological confessions. The movie opens this week in theatres across North America — not surprisingly, with an "R" rating. Meanwhile, Blum has signed on to a new cinematic project with Hollywood "golden-boy" producer-director Ivan Reitman, formerly of Hamilton and Toronto.

Ballet

The National Ballet of Canada is presenting its Les Grands Ballets Canadiens program March 5-6 at the Hummingbird Centre in Toronto. Part of the program, Perpetuum is based on music by Johann Strauss and choreographed by Israeli Ohad Naharin who is the artistic director of the Batsheva Dance Company.

For tickets call 416-872-2262.

In The Spotlight

Bestselling New York-area author and professor of neurology Oliver Sacks (Awakenings, An Anthropologist On Mars) recently gave a reading in Toronto from his latest book, The Island of The Colorblind (Knopf, $31). Redolent of Stevenson, Melville and Darwin, Sacks' account of his voyages to several exotic islands in the South Pacific, where he set up a one-room medical dispensary, reads like a 19th-century adventure narrative combined with a modern medical detective story.

While investigating an isolated community of islanders born totally colorblind on the Pingelap Atoll, as well as a puzzling neurodegenerative paralysis on Guam, Sacks found that the experience reawakened his lifelong passion for botany and in particular, for the primitive cycad tree. His book is an intriguing personal reflection on matters neurological, botanical and geological.

A potted fern — a cycad — shared the stage with Sacks at Convocation Hall. When he walked on stage, he went straight to the plant, studied its leaves, then announced, "It's a lady!" much to the audience's great amusement. Afterwards, someone asked why he regarded the cycad as such an important part of creation. "I would have thought it was self-evident," he replied. "But beauty, I guess, is in the eye of the beholder."

His love of primitive plants arose in his London childhood, he explained, when his mother and aunt tended a garden full of ferns — which were replaced with Jerusalem artichokes during the war.

"I tend to have a feeling for the primitive; so basically I don't like flowering plants — I think of them as irritating Johnny-come-latelies that have disturbed the stately mesozoic tempo where my friends flourished. Similarly, I prefer invertebrates to vertebrates, inorganic chemistry to organic chemistry and the subcortex to the cortex. That's why I like the cycad."

Business Profile

Entrepreneur creates a virtual mall

David Lucatch: Valu-net International

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The statistics are in and they are formidable. An estimated seven million Canadians have access to the Internet, fully 23 percent of the population. Thirteen percent of them log on from their homes. Around the world, it's believed 50 or 60 million users are hooked up to the worldwide computer network, with 250,000 more joining each month.

Last May, the Ottawa Citizen reported there were between five and 10 million individual Web sites (Internet addresses) worldwide and that number was doubling every six months.

In short, it appears the Internet is spreading as fast as a computer virus, making it a natural medium for businesspeople to look to for advertising and sales.

But how to get noticed if you're one business among thousands in the brave new world of Internet commerce?

Entrepreneur David Lucatch believes he's hit on the answer. Create a "supermall," a "virtual storefront environment" in which businesses are grouped together as if in the traditional glass and concrete shopping structure. Add a "theme park environment" featuring entertainment, education, sports, contests, games and other promotions to generate traffic.

Consumers with access to the Internet will be able to dial up the "supermall," pick a category of merchandise or services and click on an icon to get access to the businesses listed. Then they'll be able to "stroll" down the business' virtual aisles, examine merchandise, compare costs and, in the end, order and pay for the goods they want.

Up and running for the past few months, Valu-net International [www.valuenetwork.com] has taken the 19th century concept of catalogue shopping, merged it with 20th century notions of advertising and sales and created a 21st century model for consumer transactions.

Lucatch, Valu-net's president, believes he's hit on the wave of the future as more and more people turn to computers to handle the business of everyday life. Young people are as familiar with keyboards and computers as a previous generation was with the telephone and television, while even seniors are getting into the act.

Recent research shows that retirees who've used a computer in their businesses have entered a comfort zone and are surfing the Net along with their teenage grandchildren, Lucatch said.

And a survey released in December by ACNielsen shows that of the 23 percent of Canadians aged 12 and older who use the Internet, 11 percent have already made an Internet purchase.

Retailers are coming to realize there's a vast potential market out there among computer users who can be reached easily and at a moderate price.

"We've taken the expense and the mystique out of the Internet," Lucatch said. "Our price is so moderate, we've made it affordable for every business out there."

Although the price varies depending on the service desired, at $139 per year for a full color "coupon site," any business can gain entry to Internet advertising through Valu-net. A "mini-site" — one page with full graphics — goes for $379 a year, the equivalent, Lucatch said, to a single printing of 2,000 black and white flyers. A custom site is available at $1,500 per year.

As a new company seeking to make a name for itself, "we're pricing ourselves to build volume," Lucatch says.

In addition to the "rent" charged merchants, Valu-net generates revenue through a transaction fee of under three percent and a percentage of credit card sales.

Employing the latest hardware from Sun Microsystems of Canada and software from Netscape Communications, Valu-net is planning to offer fully secure Internet electronic transactions in the near future.

David Lucatch

Netscape's most advanced encryption system allows for on-line credit card transactions to be completely confidential, Lucatch says. In about two years, an even more advanced technology will be introduced, called SET (Secure Electronic Transactions), which will eclipse the current "interim" technology and become the industry standard, he added.

"Valu-net's merchant system provides both the authorization of the credit card transaction and settlement of monies to the merchant through the Bank of Nova Scotia," Lucatch says.

So far, 650 businesses, mostly small to medium-sized, have signed on to the Valu-net supermall, with growth projected at 125 more per month. Valu-net has representatives in Malaysia and New Zealand and in other Canadian cities drumming up business and it plans to eventually enter the highly-competitive U.S. marketplace as well.

"We've developed a strategy to gain strength offshore and like a tidal wave hit the North American shore," Lucatch says.

So far, Valu-net is getting about 70,000 "visits" per week. Lucatch is close to signing three anchor clients" whose size and reputation should entice even more shoppers into the mall.

At 34, Lucatch is an energetic and ambitious entrepreneur. He studied computers in university but his degree is in commerce and economics. He started the company two years ago with the backing of an investment group who own a small percentage of the company. Although there are competitors — IBM has opened its own on-line mall featuring the Hudson's Bay Company — Lucatch believes Valu-net offers the best price coupled with the most sophisticated computer platform. The result is top of the line speed, encryption and reliability.

"We've invested in the best to be the best," he says.

Valu-net employs 15 people in its Markham head office, including six technical and design people. Altogether, about 75 people worldwide work with Valu-net to drum up business.

Lucatch said he expects Valu-net to continue to show strong growth in the future. Last January, fewer than 100 clients had signed on, generating about $10,000 a month in "rent." This year's client base generates between $30,000 and $40,000 per month. He expects that to jump to $50,000 to $60,000 by May as Valu-net adds more merchants

With a total of about $1 million invested in the business (little of which is bank loans), Lucatch expects Valu-net to become profitable by midyear.

After that, the sky's the limit, he believes. With a logo that features a graphic of a world map, Lucatch's ambition is to make Valu-net "go global." His enthusiasm and confidence in the venture is infectious. He believes he's entered on the ground floor of a business that has nowhere to go but up as more and more people jump on the Internet bandwagon.

"We're at the front of a rally new business empire," he says. "Since the introduction of television, there hasn't been a technology with the impact the Internet will have."

WALLENBERG HONORED

Queen Elizabeth and Israeli President Ezer Weizman recently attended the unveiling ceremony of the Raoul Wallenberg Sculpture at Great Cumberland Place. The sculpture commemorates the Swedish diplomat's efforts to save Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust. The monument was commissioned by the Wallenberg Appeal, a project of the International Council of Christians and Jews. [RNS photo]

Funding the legacy of the 6 million

By GERALD M. STEINBERG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Over 50 years after the end of the Holocaust nightmare, the bank accounts, gold, property and other assets taken from the victims or smuggled out of Germany, Austria, Hungary, Poland, France and other areas of Nazi stronghold and conquest are finally being pried from the vaults.

Opinion

Some of these assets clearly belong to the surviving families and heirs; after some resistance, mechanisms to return them are being created.

But vast sums of money, estimated by some to be $7 billion or even more, including appreciation at nominal rates, cannot be returned to the families, because there are no survivors. The focus has now shifted to deciding who should control and what should be done with these funds and assets.

Representatives of the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and the heads of various Diaspora groups have started to meet in the effort to develop common objectives.

There is general agreement among the Jewish communities here and in the Diaspora that the money and assets that cannot be claimed by the families of the victims should be dedicated to the memory of the victims, to fighting Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism, and to reviving the Jewish people through educational activities and programs. While these are the only appropriate responses, care must be taken to ensure that the money is not used to feed a bloated bureaucracy.

YAD Vashem would be an appropriate place to begin. As the world's central Holocaust memorial, it has sought to ensure that each of the approximately six million Jewish victims is remembered.

For many years the institution was under-funded; a few years ago, it was forced to reduce its activities and let go some of its researchers. Since then, the government has increased its annual budgetary allocation and other funds have been secured.

A large endowment, based on a part of the unclaimed assets of Jewish Holocaust victims, would provide Yad Vashem with the resources to fund ongoing education programs like the school for Holocaust studies, and develop related curricula and readings in many languages.

Additional funds, as available, could be divided among other institutions that fight Holocaust denial and deal with the problems and impact on second-, and now even third-generation survivors.

The land around Auschwitz that was being used to construct a shopping centre should be purchased and turned into a fitting memorial. The same approach could be applied, where appropriate and necessary, at the sites of other concentration camps in Europe.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the legacies of the victims — both as individuals and as members of the Jewish people — are best honored through Jewish education. After the Nazis, who physically devastated world Jewry, ignorance and assimilation is bringing a spiritual and cultural Holocaust.

In considering how to allocate the recovered and unclaimed funds, equal priority should be given to institutions and programs directly engaged in these efforts to preserve and revive our people and our culture.

Many Diaspora Jewish educational institutions are chronically short of funds for basic services, materials, and paying teachers. Improving the quality of Jewish education, not only in terms of religious practice, but, more importantly, by teaching history, literature, and Jewish culture, would help restore some of the losses that devastated the Jewish people in this century.

Israel is now the core of Jewish cultural life, and the programs that bring Jewish students and adults to Israel for summers, one-year study programs, and shorter workshops are growing.

By applying the money and resources stolen from the victims of the Nazis to these programs, the legacy of the six million will be maintained for all time.

Anti-Semitism in Australia rises

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY – Almost 300 anti-Semitic incidents occurred in Australia in 1996, according to information released last week by the Executive Council of Australian Jewry.

Included are vandalism of synagogues and other Jewish communal property, verbal and physical harassment and anti-Semitic graffiti.

About one-third of the incidents involved anti-Semitic mail and some 20 percent involved threatening telephone calls.

The incidents also included the desecration of Jewish graves in two cemeteries, the smashing of synagogue windows in five cities and various bomb threats to Jewish institutions.

"In 1996, anti-Semitic groups and individuals became more brazen in their rhetoric, more confident in their public posturing and more willing to directly harass Australian Jews," said council president Diane Shteinman.

The council's information comes from reports from areas with Jewish communities.

The previous highest total was in 1995, when 243 anti-Semitic incidents were recorded, according to the council.

"Racism can not be allowed to gain a foothold here, and our political leaders have a responsibility to be in the forefront of efforts to strengthen tolerance, fairness and the essentially inclusive nature of Australian society," Shteinman said.

Maccabi mini-football coach predicts medal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Yet another Maccabi Canada team, this time in indoor soccer, has been finalized for the 15th edition of the Maccabiah Games in Israel, July 14 to 24.

And coach Joe Amar of Montreal was so impressed with the booters after the national trials here that he felt Canada's prospects for a medal in the sport, also called "mini-football," are better than ever before.

"I think that this year's team will be the best that mini-football ever came up with," Amar said. "It's the first time in many, many Maccabiahs that we have a real chance for a medal. If I don't bring one back, I better quit."

The last time Canada garnered a mini-soccer medal in Israel was in 1981, when it took a bronze. And except for a hard-fought bronze medal Canada earned by beating Mexico at the Pan Am Maccabiah Games in Argentina in1995, performances at the Jewish Olympics have been spotty since that original bronze.

Canada finished in fifth spot in 1985, seventh in 1989 and eighth in 1993.

But Amar pointed out that those finishes are somewhat misleading. In 1993, for example, Canada lost to Israel 4-3, the only team among the field of 14 to lose to Israel by only one point, and was put out of the medal-running early.

What may spell the difference this time out, Amar said, is that this year's national trials drew a much higher calibre of talent, literally from all over the world. The final team of 11 athletes and six alternates was winnowed down from 37 who came from Vancouver, Winnipeg,Toronto, Montreal and other regions for the trials.

A few Canadians living abroad even flew in especially for the trials from Great Britain, Israel, California and Florida.

For Amar, 42 and a veteran of the '85 team (this will be his third Maccabiah as coach), this year's indoor soccer team will do well because they are young (average age 22½), strong, and brimming with talent.

Winnipegger Collin Berenhaut, 19, plays for Canada's national outdoor soccer team "and could probably sign a professional contract tomorrow," Amar said. "He is that excellent."

Three members of the team – all from Montreal – are vets of '93: Jason Bressler, Oren Bitton (born in Israel and a McGill medical student) and Steve Lazarus, who also helped Canada win its bronze in Argentina in '95 and flew in from California for the trials.

The other team members include: Ron Eliachim and Roy Raviv (who flew in from Great Britain) of Montreal; Jason Levitt of Vancouver, and Dany Hadida (who flew in from Florida), Offer Winkler, Irvin Studin, and Dan Sankar, all from Ontario.

Six alternates will be on standby if some of the original picks can't go: Nicolas Pinto and Fabice Levy of Montreal and Shawn Rutenberg, Blake Dinkin, Leor Israelski, Fred Cowen and Mike Liechenko, all from Ontario.

Amar, who will be assisted in his coaching by David Rumack, said that as at previous Maccabiahs, Israel, Argentina and Mexico will be the teams to beat. Canada will be in the same division as Israel, and will be seeking to beat them to help them advance to the medal rounds.

Israel also has a training advantage because the country is so small, its indoor soccer team can train together for months in advance of the games. Like every other Maccabi country, however, the Canadian team will spend a week together in Montreal for a "pre-camp."

Amar noted that indoor soccer, because of its exciting speed and unique rules, such as unlimited substitutions, is getting more and more attention in Israel. The sport features a field of five players (plus a goalie) and is all non-stop action.

But future plans for Canada include sending, for the first time, an outdoor soccer team in 2001.

"There is enough talent to do that," he said, "and the national athletic committee board [of Maccabi Canada] has taken it on as a commitment."

Meanwhile, for this year, members of the indoor soccer team, like other Canadian Jewish athletes headed to Israel, will be asked to help out in fundraising efforts to pay for their trips.

The cost of sending athletes to Israel is high: about $5,000 each.

Lawn bowlers seek funds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Imagine if you had to roll a good "wood" uphill when competing at lawn bowling. Things would get frustrating pretty quickly — exactly the kind of feeling being experienced by Sonny Isaacs as he attempts to solicit support for a proposed Maccabi lawn bowling team.

Isaacs, vice-president of the Maccabi lawn bowling section, has come up against several roadblocks, including corporate disinterest and public apathy, as he attempts to raise the $50,000 needed to fully finance 10 lawn bowlers for the upcoming Maccabiah Games in Israel. The Games will be held from July 5 to 15 at various locales in Israel.

Isaacs is appealing to the public to help support the lawn bowling team, noting that there are enough quality bowlers in Canada to win several medals.

Les Abro, for one, has already represented Canada and South Africa at the games and won a silver medal in pairs competition in 1989.

Joyce Kruss, originally from Capetown, South Africa, won the singles title at the Willowdale Lawn Bowling Club and has also won district (regional) events in greater Toronto. Before that, she represented the Western Province in internal South African competition.

Jack Siboni, a native of Morocco, won the Willowdale singles title two years ago as well as several pairs championships when teamed up with Abro.

And Joyce Rembach is "one of the team's better bowlers," having won seniors "trips" (triples) competitions on several occasions. Rembach also represented South Africa at the Maccabiah Games prior to moving to Canada, Isaacs said.

Despite that overall team quality, the players have been left on their own to finance the team. Maccabi Canada has declined to provide any funds. "They say it's all seniors and Maccabi Canada hopes to encourage the younger generation in all sports," Isaacs said.

Anyone interested in supporting the team can contact Isaacs at 905-764-5548.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

"היו זמנים"

טבעי שכל שישראל מתברגת, כן גוברת הנטייה להפנות מבט נוסטלגי לאחור, לזמנים שהיו. שני ספרים שיצאו לאור לאחרונה מעידים שגם הזכרון הנוסטלגי מחלחץ צבעים.

הוא היה שותף בייסוד "גדוד העבודה", הושפע מטרומפלדור, סלל דרכים, חצב אבנים, עסק בשמירה ולוחמה צבאית. וכידוע, הפך ל"אבא" של הפלמ"ח (פלוגות מחץ). את חיילי הפלמ"ח הכשיר להיות חיילים למופת. יגאל אלון, משה דיין ויצחק רבין היו חניכיו. הוא לא חתר לשלוט באנשיו אלא לשמש להם כמקור השראה מוחלט. הוא לא שאף להתמסד בתהליך המדיני-פוליטי אלא העדיף תהליכי קבלת החלטות בסגנון של שיח לוחמים סביב למדורה. ברבות הימים, אי-רצונו להכיר במרות פוליטית הביא לסכסוך בינו לבין בן גוריון. סוף הסיפור ידוע: הפלמ"ח פורק ויצחק שדה הודח מממלכתו. למרות שבמלחמת העצמאות שוב הוכיח עצמו כמפקד מעולה, הוא נושל ממדיו וכ"יסתם" אזרח, הרחק ממשכנו הצבאי, לא מצא לעצמו עיסוק של ממש ולא רווה נחת משארית חייו.

About families

Dear Susan,

I am a male in my mid-40s who recently lost my job as a result of corporate downsizing.

I am having problems accepting the fact my family will now be supported financially by my wife and I feel doubts about whether my teenage boys will continue to hold a high opinion of me. I find myself in a continual battle against depression and despair.

While I recognize that my feelings are not rational, they make it difficult to deal with the present and plan for the future.

Dear Reader,

Thank you for having the courage to share your feelings. Since many men draw a significant degree of their identity and self-worth from their careers, the loss of a job will often mean a dislocation from their fundamental sense of self.

One of the principal effects of your loss of self-esteem is its impact on your ability to plan for the future. Your depression will make it difficult for you to cope, which will increase your feelings of inedequacy and despair — a vicious circle. By taking action, no matter how difficult and uncertain the first steps may be, you break that vicious circle.

This is also the time to rely on your wife for more than financial support. Share your feelings with her and allow her to help you emotionally. She will undoubtedly be there for you.

Reach out to your friends and family, no matter how difficult that may be. Remember reaching out for help is not weakness and others do not equate your job status with your worthiness as a human being.

Your feelings about your sons are understandable and typical. If you suffer from feelings of inadequacy, you believe that others consider you inadequate. You need to understand that this is not true, even if you have trouble believing it. If you give your sons a chance, you will feel their continued respect and love.

Give your loved ones a chance, and, most importantly, give yourself a chance. You and your family will come out of this experience intact.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 18 years.

CJC meets Swiss envoy

Dormant accounts discussed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Officials from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Switzerland's ambassador to Canada have pledged to keep talking, following last week's groundbreaking meeting here on the subject of dormant bank accounts.

CJC president Goldie Hershon joined Congress' Bernie Farber and Eric Vernon for the 90-minute meeting with Swiss ambassador Daniel Dayer – the first time Canadian Jewish officials have met with a Swiss envoy to discuss speeding up claims Holocaust survivors or descendants of victims here may have against banks in Switzerland.

The meeting took place the day before the Swiss government announced plans for a $6.3-billion fund to aid victims of the Holocaust. The fund will be financed by selling off some gold reserves of the Swiss National Bank.

Farber told a press conference following the meeting with Dayer that there are approximately 100 Holocaust survivors in Canada who believe they have legitimate and credible claims for dormant or seized Swiss bank accounts.

"Time is of the essence," Farber said, noting that the average age of claimants is between 75 and 85. He said most survivors don't have the time or energy for an "overburdened bureaucracy."

Former CJN editor dies at 78

CJN Staff

TORONTO — Maurice Lucow, the Western correspondent of The Canadian Jewish News and its former editor, died in Victoria on March 4. He would have turned 79 on March 9.

"He played a unique role in the development of The CJN," said publisher Donald Carr.

"He was its editor during times of change and he brought to that position a loyalty, a quiet professionalism and a sophisticated, analytical approach which was so important.

"He held strong views and principles; yet he understood what was, for a community weekly newspaper, the necessary balance between the needs

Living under the shadow of hate

By ELDAD BECK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TOULON, France — This southern port city has become an important symbol of what may happen nationwide, as a result of the recent victories of Jean-Marie LePen's Front National (FN) in the region.

Its new role as the party in power at Toulon's city hall gives the ultra-nationalist FN an opportunity to win over doubters by showing them that it is in the mainstream, that it can govern responsibly.

For the Front's opponents, including Toulon's Jewish community of 4,000, the city of 450,000 is the line where they hope to stop the party's advance. Failure to do so could prompt many French Jews to emigrate.

Feature

"They want to present themselves as being more legal than those who represent the law in this country," Jewish community vice-chair Maurice Aziza says of the Front. "Once they get the vote on the national level, they will do whatever they wish."

Toulon is the FN's greatest political asset to date, along with three other towns: Orange, Marignane and Vitrolles, where the FN won control of the city council last month. Next year, the party will contest national legislative elections.

No outward changes have been seen in France's fourth largest city since the election in June 1995 of Mayor Jean-Marie Le Chevalier, once Le Pen's closest adviser.

The changes there, however, have nonetheless been insidious. A prominent example was Le Chevalier's decision to ban French-Jewish author Marek Halter from the city's MONTREAL — The Jewish Education Council of Montreal, a constituent agency of FEDERATION CJA, is looking for Jewish students who graduated from Montreal-area high schools in the years 1981, 1984 and 1987 to take part in a survey looking into the accomplishments of these individuals.

The survey will attempt to find out where these people live and in what professions they are working.

If you or someone you know graduated in these years, call Charles Shahar, at 514-735-3541, ext. 3250.

ISRAEL

Aliyah Statistics

JERUSALEM — In 1996, 76,600 new immigrants came to Israel from all over the world, according to the Jewish Agency. Of the total, 58,900 were from the former Soviet Union (FSU). By comparison, in 1989, just over 24,000 new immigrants came to Israel, of whom 12,000 were from the FSU.

Women of the Wall Case

JERUSALEM — In an apparent bid to resolve the Women of the Wall issue, Israel's Supreme Court has granted the government 90 days to show "just cause" why women who wish to pray at the Western Wall cannot do so as a group.

The court ruling denied a government request for a 60-day postponement. Representatives of the group were clearly pleased by the court's refusal to grant the government yet another extension.

Threats Ignored

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rejected threats from 17 coalition members who said they would withdraw their support of the government unless the premier refused to pull out of some areas in the West Bank that are now under sole Israeli authority.

WORLD

Arafat in D.C.

WASHINGTON – Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat ended a two-day visit to Washington by refusing to complete the process of amending the Palestinian Covenant until Israel adopts a constitution. Members of Congress called on Arafat to submit changes to the covenant.

JCC Damaged

LOUISVILLE — The Jewish Community Centre in Louisville, Ky., was one of the victims of the region's widespread flooding. More than 10 inches of rain fell in less than 24 hours. A damage estimate for the centre was not available, but losses are extensive.

Holocaust Fund Slammed

ZURICH — In a speech laced with anti-Semitic references, a right-wing member of the Swiss Parliament has lashed out against his country's decision to endorse a memorial fund for needy Holocaust survivors.

Addressing a rally here, Christoph Blocher also said that Switzerland had no reason to apologize for doing business with Nazi Germany and that the country would be admitting guilt if it contributed to the memorial fund.

ISRAEL ACHIEVES OBJECTIVES IN RAIDS

Israel announced the completion of its military operations against Arab terrorists in southern Lebanon and said all of its objectives had been achieved in the four days of ground battles and air strikes.

According to Israeli sources, at least 50 terrorists were killed and about 100 wounded. Eleven Israelis were wounded, most of them subsequently released from hospital.

Kol Israel radio said the operation had been successful in its intended purpose of pushing the terrorists father back from Israel and destroying their bases and munitions dumps.

EXPECT KASHRUT RULES PROBE

Ontario's Consumer Protection Bureau promised to conduct a complete investigation into any allegations from members of the Jewish community that a business which claims to be kosher is not observing kashrut regulations.

Under Ontario's Consumer Protection Act, the bureau may issue a "cease and desist" order requiring the removal of a kosher sign should an investigation reveal that a store owner's advertising is deliberately false, misleading or deceptive.

Branson ordered to close doors

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The decision to close the doors of North York Branson Hospital will leave the area of Metro Toronto that has the largest Jewish population without any near access to primary medical care within a few years.

"We're shocked that we're being closed outright and not even being converted to an ambulatory care centre," said Branson president and CEO Jack Gallop.

Meanwhile an effort is under way to establish some kind of family health centre in the vacuum to be left by the future closing of all services at Branson.

North York General Hospital is ready to assist Branson and others in setting up such a service, its president and CEO Murray Mackenzie told The CJN.

"We have 30 days to make such a recommendation to the hospital commission and if they don't agree we'll do it somehow," said Mackenzie.

Branson is one of 10 hospitals in Metro to be closed within the next three years by decision of the Hospital Services Restructuring Commission. Others to shut their doors include Women's College, Wellesley, and the Grace and Orthopedic hospitals.

Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Hospital are to stay intact.

"Our hospital will continue as a centre of excellence in cooperation with other hospitals on University Avenue and greatly expand its obstetrics and gynecology departments," said Lloyd Fogler, Mount Sinai board chair.

Baycrest Hospital supports the general idea of restructuring hospital services, but is concerned that enough money and resources be made available for long-term and home care, said vice-president Moshe Greengarten.

Baycrest is sensitive to the needs of the elderly Jewish community and will coninue to discuss with UJA Federation, Senior Care and other groups plans for community home care.

Gallop expressed surprise that the commission's report said that of the patients who would ordinarily go to Branson for emergency and inpatient care, a total of 60 percent would go to York Finch Hospital, 30 percent to North York General and 10 percent to York Central in Richmond Hill.

For surgery, half of the Branson patients would go to North York General and half to York Finch, the commission said.

"The community in this area is opposed to going further west for hospital treatment and many have to rely on the TTC," said Gallop. "We stressed this in our presentaion to the commission," he said.

Gallop said Branson had told the commission that it was enthusiastic about becoming an ambulatory care centre, but to no avail.

Branson has 258 acute care beds, including special services, and a staff of 1,000 to 1,100 part time or full time plus 300 doctors.

TRAINING IN ISRAEL

While their peers relaxed over winter break, 20 young Canadians who will be leading Israel Experience summer programs were working hard in Israel preparing for the summer. The programs were the idea of the newly created Canada Israel Experience Centre, a national umbrella organization dedicated to increasing the number of Jewish youth who participate in Israel Experience programs. For 10 days the Canadian staff were taught programming skills specific to sites in Israel, program logistics and leadership skills. Former CJN editor had wide newspaper background of that community and hard news or commentary. For this, his rich background in journalism and his former professional service to the community stood him in good stead.

"We were fortunate that, during his 'retirement' in Victoria, he continued to serve the readership of The CJN, reporting events in British Columbia in that crisp prose to which we had become accustomed. Frequently he would continue to offer constructive ideas for the development of The CJN. I only wish that our relationship, both on a personal level and through the paper, could have continued for many more years."

Patricia Rucker, who took over his chair as editor, said: "He was a real newspaperman. He loved all aspects of the business and he loved getting the paper out. One of my clearest memories of him is watching him pacing up and down the production room just after that week's edition had gone out the door, and you could see that he was already doing the next week's paper in his head.

"He could be gruff, he had strong opinions, but beneath that exterior, he loved his community and he genuinely loved his staff.

"It will be strange not to see the Maurice Lucow byline in the paper."

Lucow was born in Winnipeg in 1918. By the time he graduated from St. John's High School, the Great Depression was at its height and a job he was looking for in journalism — or any type of job — was impossible for a Jewish boy to get.

However, under a government plan, he was able to attend classes in graphic arts and study basic journalism.

Eventually he managed to become the one-man editorial staff of the old weekly Western Jewish News. One year, when travelling with his advertising manager through Western Canada in preparation for a Rosh Hashanah edition, he was able to visit the major Western cities — Regina, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary and Edmonton, and he developed a deep and abiding interest in the area — an interest which stood him in good stead in later years.

Maurice Lucow

His experience at the Western Jewish News resulted in an offer by the Winnipeg Free Press, one of Canada's most influential newspapers, to cover the large Jewish community in Manitoba, as well as general news. Even Jewish weddings were newsworthy in those days and Lucow became quite expert in describing the bridal gowns, mother-of-the-bride dresses and all the other trimmings.

During World War II, he enlisted in the RCAF and took his basic and wireless training in Dorval and Montreal. While in Dorval, he ran a daily noon-hour news broadcast on the parade square, usually with 5,000 airmen in attendance.

On completion of the wireless training course, he was posted to Patricia Bay near Victoria where he spent most of his RCAF time.

Lucow and his wife Marion stayed on in Victoria for about a year after the war. For family reasons, they moved back to Winnipeg and the Free Press where they remained until 1950.

After a devastating flood hit Winnipeg, they moved to Toronto.

Lucow answered an ad for an editor experienced in the ladies' fashion industry at Maclean Hunter and became one of three Jews on the Maclean Hunter staff.

The move was a good one and he stayed with the company for 15 years, becoming publisher of its newspaper, Style. As well, he started Home Goods Retailing, and for a time edited both Style and Home Goods. He twice won the annual Maclean Hunter award for best editor and was twice named best publisher.

In 1971, the United Jewish Welfare Fund offered him the position of director of public relations, which he accepted, "because the pay was good and [he] wanted to get back into a Jewish atmosphere."

At the time Lucow joined the Welfare Fund staff, Ray Wolfe and a small group of other businessmen purchased The Canadian Jewish News to serve as a community newspaper. Veteran newsman Ralph Hyman was named editor and Lucow worked closely with him to build the paper into a community organ.

When Hyman retired in 1980, Lucow became The CJN's editor, a position he held until his retirement in 1989.

At that point, he and Marion decided to move back west, to Victoria and Wolfe agreed to let Lucow serve as west coast correspondent for the paper.

Lucow covered the west coast Jewish community during its recent period of expansion and development.

Lucow is survived by wife Marion, sisters Edit Sair and Clara Schik, of Winnipeg, brother Sol in Edmonton and many nieces and nephews throughout North America and Jerusalem.

The legacy that we cherish most, that enriches far more than mere material, that ties more firmly one generation to the next and that lasts as long as memory, is the gift of example.

Maurice Lucow's example to the subsequent editors of The CJN was one of uncompromising standards, devotion, responsibility, purpose and integrity.

It was a great gift to us and a legacy for all time.

May his memory be for blessing.

Refugees from Israel on decline in '96

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of refugees Canada accepted from Israel in 1996 fell dramatically, for the second consecutive year.

The drop appears to indicate that Jerusalem's repeated pleas to Ottawa that there's no such thing as an Israeli refugee may finally be getting through.

But again last year, the bulk of Israeli refugees were accepted in Montreal, where historically, Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) panels have been far less favorable to Israel than those in other parts of Canada.

According to figures released recently, the IRB in 1996 accepted just 92 refugee claimants from Israel, most of whom are originally from the former Soviet Union. It's the lowest total since 1990.

Also last year, the IRB rejected 840 claims of refugee status from Israel, based on 1,270 cases referred. A total of 1,819 claims from Israel are pending.

In 1995, the IRB heard 569 refugee claims from Israel, and approved 121 of them, for a national acceptance rate of 21 percent.

Because far more claims were heard to completion last year, and fewer of them were approved, the acceptance rate fell to 7.5 percent. By contrast, the acceptance rate from Israel in 1994 was 50 percent.

Most claims in Montreal

The vast majority of cases last year were seen in Montreal, where panels heard 1,093 claims and approved 80 of them. Traditionally, more claims are made in Montreal because IRB panels there are more likely to grant asylum, based on allegations that Israel persecutes its immigrants.

In Toronto, the figures were the lowest in recent memory. Only 93 claims from Israel were finalized, and just two were approved. The rest of the approvals were in Ottawa, Vancouver, Calgary and Atlantic Canada.

The latest numbers may go some way toward patching up a long-standing dispute between Ottawa and Jerusalem.

Since 1989 when the first wave of Jews left the former Soviet Union, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to this country.

Typically, former Soviets, who come here as Israeli citizens, allege that while in the Jewish state, they were harassed, persecuted, denied jobs and housing and even beaten because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews. To qualify as refugees, they must prove they have a well-founded fear of persecution in their last place of residence.

Israel has said the claims are spurious and denies it produces refugees.

Chen Ivri, a counsellor at Israel's embassy, said he welcomes the new, lower acceptances, but finds it "unbelievable" Canada still accepts refugees from the Jewish state.

"In Israel, no one is persecuted. It's a democratic country. There's no logic [to Canada's policy]."

Arab paper to apologize for article

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The publisher of the Arab language newspaper, Al-Orouba (The Arab), is expected to offer a full apology in this week's issue for an article that employed anti-Semitic stereotypes of Jews.

Sobhi Kassas, editor in chief of Al-Orouba, met last week with a delegation from Canadian Jewish Congress, who was concerned over a June 27 article that described Jews as "wicked and spiteful" and that suggested the Holocaust was a lie.

"We outlined how the article was virulent anti-Semitism and had no place in a paper published in Canada," said Len Rudner, vice-chair of community relations for Congress. Rudner was joined at the meeting by Naim Dallal, an Arab-speaking officer of Congress, and Bernie Farber, Congress' director of community relations. Rashad Saleh, president of Palestine House, also attended the meeting.

"[Kassas] understood our message and he will be printing an apology and a retraction in the next issue," Rudner added.

"It didn't take much convincing. He's relatively new to the country and is not familiar with Canadian [anti-hate] laws," Farber said. "They did a complete mea culpa."

Much of the groundwork for Kassas' decision to run a retraction was laid by Saleh, who met with the editor on several occasions. Saleh said others in the Palestinian community made him aware of a front page story in The CJN (Jan. 16) in which the Al-Orouba item was described. After reading the original Al-Orouba article, "I found out that maybe it was offensive to the Jewish community and I called Mr. Kassas," he said.

Palestinians, Jews lobby publication

"I asked him if he knew the article was offensive and might get him in trouble. He said 'no.' He's only been in the country two years and he thought he could publish anything."

The board of directors of Palestine House also met with Kassas, who is from Iraq, and "reprimanded" him, Saleh added. "And rightly so. The article is offensive to the Jewish community."

The board, which agrees the story was anti-Semitic, was also concerned there could be "trouble" between the Palestinian and Jewish communities "because of one stupid article," Saleh said.

Kassas then agreed to apologize, he added.

The article was brought to the attention of The CJN by Sasson Mayer, a Jew of Iraqi origin who keeps abreast of Arab-language newspapers. He also translated a follow-up article in Al-Orouba that ran shortly before last week's meeting, in which Kassas defended the original item on the basis of freedom of speech.

Kassas was unavailable for comment.

Thornhill Grits upset; Tories choose candidate

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Just as the federal Conservatives elected their hopeful in the riding of Thornhill, some Liberals are angry at growing speculation that Prime Minister Jean Chrétien will appoint MPP Elinor Caplan as the riding's Liberal candidate.

Bill Fisch, a three-term ward and regional councillor in Markham, defeated architect Barry Cline on the first ballot to become the Tory candidate in Thornhill.

Fisch, a member of B'nai Brith and Darchei Noam Congregation, told The CJN he wants to "keep the momentum going" and open a campaign office soon.

Meantime, some Liberals in Thornhill are circulating a petition calling on Chrétien not to appoint a candidate.

Hundreds of signatures have already been collected.

In a speech to Liberal women over the weekend, Chrétien said he will use the power of appointment at his discretion to top up the party's quotient of female candidates in the next election.

He said he wants 25 percent of all Liberal hopefuls to be women.

Liberal sources have said Chrétien would appoint Caplan, the MPP for Oriole and a 12-year veteran of Queen's Park, as the candidate in Thornhill.

Caplan has neither confirmed nor denied that. She was on vacation and unavailable for comment as The CJN went to press Monday.

Speculation that the Liberals may bypass the nomination process has angered many in Thornhill. Some members of the Liberal riding association say democracy would be subverted should the prime minister appoint Caplan.

"All we're saying is, democracy should prevail," says Itia Golan, a member of the riding association's executive. "If [Caplan] is so terrific, why doesn't she run, like everyone else?"

Thornhill, which won't exist until the next election, has been estimated to be 25 to 35 percent Jewish, and other Liberal hopefuls — Bernie Green, Doron Aronson and Mario Racco — have been courting the Jewish vote.

No date has been set yet for the Liberal nomination, and Golan says she finds that "upsetting. We're in limbo."

Anti-Semitic incidents declined in 1996

B'nai Brith reports findings in audit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was good news and bad news in B'nai Brith's (BB) annual audit of anti-Semitism in Canada, released last week.

On the positive side, BB's League for Human Rights reported a decrease of anti-Semitic incidents across the country, with Toronto experiencing a precipitous drop from 159 reported incidents in 1995 to 98 incidents in '96. Reported incidents of vandalism and harassment in Montreal also declined, from 52 incidents to 30 in the same time span.

However, the League pointed to increased extremist presence on the Internet, heightened racist recruitment in the West and in smaller communities and examples of anti-Semitic material being carried in the "ethnic press" as causes for concern and vigilance.

"Hate on the Internet is becoming more sophisticated, with use of 'real audio' and the links through Marc Lemire's Freedom Site," said Karen Mock, national director of the League. "The concept of leaderless resistance among extremists is also a continued cause for vigilance," she said, adding that "a one-year decrease doesn't indicate a trend."

The audit found there were 244 anti-Semitic incidents reported to the League in 1996, a decrease of

Karen Mock

26.3 percent from the totals the year before, which had been the highest number in 14 years.

The incidents were categorized as either "vandalism" (property damage) or "harassment" (distribution of hate propaganda) and the audit found that while the number of vandalism incidents remained the same, harassment incidents declined.

Package bomb

The most serious incident of vandalism recorded in the audit took place in April when a package bomb was sent to the Jewish National Fund office in the Calgary Jewish Community Centre. One woman was injured when the detonator, though not the main explosives, went off.

The audit also reported that "in the last few years, the organized neo-Nazi right in Canada has become somewhat fragmented" as membership in the Heritage Front decreased after the exposure in 1994 of Grant Bristow as a government intelligence mole.

Since then, no single leader has been able to galvanize the far-right and racist groups have adopted the strategy of leaderless resistance, "creating small cells of individuals to elude infiltration," the audit stated.

Mock suggested the decline in overt racist incidents may also be attributable to the shift in focus among extremists to use of the Internet as a tool for recruitment and disseminating material.

The audit also noted that while there has been a general decline in skinhead activity, "there has been a rise in activities among Polish skinheads or 'Polskas.'"

It is estimated there are as many as 100 Polskas, recruited heavily from among recent immigrants. They congregate in the west end of Toronto in the Bloor and Jane area, Roncesvalles and Lakeshore Boulevard.

"Although every region in Canada reported at least some serious incidents last year, the patterns of anti-Semitic activity have differed in different regions of the country," said Lyle Smordin, national president of B'nai Brith. "The climate was very tense for minority communities in post-referendum Quebec."

Among incidents in Quebec reported in the audit: l'Office de la langue française urged stores to remove imported kosher products that did not have labels in French; Radio Canada reporter Normand Lester claimed he could not be treated in French at the Jewish General Hospital; former FLQ terrorist Raymond Villeneuve denounced English speaking Jews for opposing Quebec separation and warned that Jews could face confrontation if that view continued; Le Soleil columnist Michael Vestel said in a radio interview that Jews should apologize to Christians for crucifying Jesus.

War crimes unit considering new cases

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Federal authorities will announce by April 1 whether they will ask Justice Minister Allan Rock to authorize new proceedings to deport more alleged war criminals than originally planned.

Responding to reports that the Justice Department's war crimes unit is planning to ask Rock for staff and resources to go beyond the 12 promised cases, Paul Vickery, head of the war crimes unit, said no such request has yet been made of Rock. So far, all discussions have taken place within the war crimes unit and the Justice Department, he said.

Vickery declined to give any details about further cases and he denied a report from England that suggested Canada is about to deport 64 war crimes suspects.

Timothy Kirkhope, parliamentary under-secretary of state for the Home Office, told the British House of Commons that a special Scotland Yard unit is monitoring the situation in Canada. "In Canada, 64 suspects have been identified and they may be deported," he said.

Meanwhile, Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber welcomed reports that Canada may begin further war crimes cases, saying Congress has urged such a step for some time.

Maurice Lucow 1918-1997

"Okay, let's go! We've got to get a paper out," Maurice would say, and say often during his nine memorable years as editor of The Canadian Jewish News.

Those of us who worked with Maurice remember him and his famous phrase fondly. The oft -repeated exhortation came to symbolize the man and his unparalleled dedication to producing the best paper possible each week.

One cold, grey day in February of 1980, as he sat behind the editor's desk for the first time, Maurice confided to a colleague that succeeding the universally well-liked and respected Ralph Hyman was not going to be easy.

Maurice, typically, accepted the challenge in his own way. With an impressive amalgam of experience at the Winnipeg Free Press, Style magazine and in public relations, Maurice was perfectly suited for the next stage of The CJN. During his tenure as editor, Maurice demonstrated a unique ability to preserve the progress achieved in the paper's first decade while steering The CJN in a number of new directions.

We will remember Maurice as a determined builder of this newspaper who took a promising young publication and moved it along with the times, continuously contributing his own improvements over the next decade — and even afterwards as he became our first West Coast representative.

We will also remember Maurice as a sometimes gruff, but always loyal, colleague and friend who each day presented a level of commitment and hard work that we found difficult to match. The consummate golf duffer, Maurice would announce once every summer that he was "taking the afternoon off" to play at his beloved Buttonville club. We soon learned that Maurice's idea of taking the afternoon off was leaving the office at 4:45.p.m. "The traffic's easier if I wait a bit," he'd explain.

Even now we can picture him standing in the composing room for hours, pens spilling out of his favorite blue cardigan, as he double-checked proofs and made up pages. We can hear him urging his staff on: "Mop up, people. We've go to get a paper out." And we can see once again the light-hearted mood that magically transformed him in the moments after the paper was finally put to bed each week.

As we go to press with this issue, our thoughts and prayers are with Maurice's beloved wife Marion and the nieces and nephews he leaves behind. Yes, Maurice, you got the paper out. You did it very well indeed, and we learned much from you in the process. For that we thank you, and for that we will always remember you.

One voice: Jerusalem

The vast majority of the people of Israel believe with one voice and one heart that Jerusalem must remain the undivided capital of the sovereign Jewish state. This has been Jewry's aspiration for millennia and the policy of every government of Israel since 1967. The outcry from the Palestinians over the decision to build "Jewish" housing on Har Choma is an attempt to delegitimize that policy and to stymie that aspiration. But no force on earth can delegitimize, stymie, discredit or impair the Jews' place in Jerusalem.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"A popular movement of such vast dimensions will necessarily be attacked from many sides. Therefore the Congress will concern itself with the spiritual means to be employed for reviving and fostering the national consciousness of the Jews."

(From Herzl's opening address to the Congress)

Thanks for the puzzle, but no thanks

I am delighted that there is a crossword puzzle in The CJN. As an avid enthusiast, I find this an excellent addition to the newspaper. However, I am appalled and mortified at some of the clues, such as "Nuremberg presentation," "Schindler tally," "Hitler."

Are these clues the kind that are really appropriate for a Jewish newspaper? Hitler? Nuremberg? Schindler? Do we need to be reminded?

Fund Congress on its own

In the controversy over the roles of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Combined Jewish Appeal, I support the position of the CJC. At their last plenary (in May 1995), I received only smiles when I asked why the CJC doesn't have a foundation to fund its role as the umbrella organization of Canadian Jews.

Yes, the CJC has an important and necessary role to play, but it should be independently funded and its board directly elected by those it represents. That way it can have credibility as the collective voice of all Canadian Jews and have the leverage to insist on the financial support of the Canadian Jewish community.

Orthodox view of brit milah

The Vaad Harabonim, Orthodox Rabbinical Council of Greater Toronto, wishes to make the Jewish community aware of an important aspect of the great mitzvah of brit milah (circumcision). The Halachah is clear that to be accepted as a mohel involves much more than the ability to perform a radical procedure. It requires a level of piety, observance and commitment to Torah life as outlined in the Shulchan Aruch (code of Jewish law).

Only those mohalim certified by the Vaad Harabonim meet these rigorous standards and are acceptable in accordance with Halachah. For a complete list of mohalim certified by the Vaad, please call 416-787-1631.

Wanted: Jewish oldtimers in sports

For a book I am preparing on Jews and sport in Toronto during the 1920s and 1930s, I would like to interview former female and male Jewish athletes involved in serious competitive sport during this period.

If you participated in any type of organized sport, individual or team, summer or winter, amateur or professional, or in the YM-YWHA, a playground, club and/or school sport in Toronto in those two decades, I would be most interested in learning about your athletic experiences. Please contact me at 416-633-1723 or call collect at 905-525-0455.

A list of worrisome Jewish issues

I do not view Jewish life today through rose-colored lenses. The following are some of the critical issues Jews confront: agnosticism and atheism that are higher proportionately among educated and intellectual Jews than among their Christian counterparts; intermarriage; the fanaticism, xenophobia and obscuratism of ultra-Orthodox and chassidic Jews; the hostility and hatred between ultra-Orthodox Jews and other Jews; the hatred of Zionism by many ultra-Orthodox Jews; the hatred of Zionism by Jews of the far left, who have published a significant number of books denouncing Israel; too much hypocrisy among so-called Jewish leaders; the fading of the enchantment of Israel among many mainstream Jews.

Ontario's Palestine House critical of Netanyahu

Since Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's election, we have not noticed any positive step from his government to save or give hope to the extremely fragile peace process. Even the Hebron agreement was a humiliating blow to the Palestinians because they had to concede, among the many other things, control of 20 percent of the city and give Israel full control over the holy sites.

Netanyahu's latest move to build a new settlement between East Jerusalem and Bethlehem and the closure of offices inside Jerusalem are a clear indication to the world that the Israeli government is not interested in peaceful coexistence with its neighbors nor interested in the security of its citizens.

It is time the Canadian government and the lobbying Jewish organizations stop rewarding Israel for its improper actions.

'My metaphors are my wounds'

By MARGARET KLOMPAS

Who was the German Jewish poet Nelly Sachs who won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1966, and why is she virtually unknown today? How did a poet whose early nature poetry takes as its model a Catholic saint come to write poetry that according to Dr. Anders Osterling, chair of the Nobel committee, had "become the most intense artistic expression of the Jewish spirit's reaction to suffering in our time"?

When the poet was informed that she and S.Y. Agnon were joint winners of the prestigious Nobel Prize, she commented, "Agnon represents the State of Israel. I represent the tragedy of the Jewish people." This remark summed up not only the stark reality of her life, which was torn apart by Nazi brutality, but also her poetry.

Nelly Sachs was born in Berlin on Dec. 10, 1891. Her father was a prosperous manufacturer and the family had a residence in the Tiergarten, the most aristocratic district of Berlin. Sachs was educated by private tutors in keeping with the practices of the haute bourgeoisie and her interest in music, dance and literature was encouraged. On her 15th birthday, she received a copy of Selma Lagerlof's novel Gosta Berling. So enthusiastic about the novel was Sachs that she started a correspondence with the Nobel prize winning author. This was to have very significant consequences.

An unhappy love at the age of 17 inspired Sachs to start writing verse and puppet plays. Even though she started writing at a time of great literary and artistic innovations, her work followed traditional lines. Some of her work was published in the 1920s, but in current editions of her work, these early efforts are specifically excluded at the author's request.

Sachs' life was rudely changed when the Nazis came into power. She lived in agonized isolation for seven years, increasingly threatened by deportation. As her relatives and friends (including the young man whom she had loved at 17) disappeared into concentration camps one after the other, she fled from the terror in the streets into the writings of German and Jewish mystics and greater awareness of her Jewish self. She was expected and expected herself to produce Jewish poems, but she had never studied Jewish philosophy and thus she had to make do with brief introductory essays and, ironically, a Lutheran Old Testament.

In 1940, at the last possible moment, Sachs succeeded in escaping to Sweden with her mother, aided by Lagerlof, who had enlisted the help of Prince Eugene of Sweden on her friend's behalf.

In Stockholm, the Sachses lived lonely and poverty-stricken for many years as Lagerlof, had died shortly before they reached safety. Tormented by her memories of the Nazi persecution of the Jews, Nelly Sachs identified more and more with the fate of her people. She declared herself part of suffering and persecuted European Jewry and promised her services as a poet in the service of the Jewish people.

In Stockholm she came across a copy of Martin Buber's chassidic tales, which became a major influence on her work. In his introduction to these stories, she found the sketch of a people that satisfied her religious, psychological and poetic needs. The play Eli: Ein Mysterienspiel written in 1943, includes images, figures, tales and liturgical elements from chassidic stories. A chassidic farm boy, who blew his shepherd's pipe out of pure religious exuberance during Yom Kippur, is the model for the 8-year-old shepherd boy Eli, who sounds his pipe to G-d when his parents are being chased down an alley by Nazi executioners. The chassidic boy of the tale broke the curse and drove anger from the face of the earth, says Ba'al Shem Tov; but the heavens remain closed to Eli, the Polish boy, who is murdered by a German soldier. In 17 loosely connected scenes, Eli's tragic story is presented through flashbacks and is interwoven with the legend of the 36 just men.

Nelly Sachs

Sachs wrote her "Jewish" poetry during and after the war. "Death gave me my language," she said. "Writing is my mute outcry — I only wrote because I had to free myself. My metaphors are my wounds." These poems, which differed radically from her earlier poems, were first published in 1946 in East Berlin in a collection called In the Habitations of Death.

The most famous poem in this collection is Oh the Chimneys:

O the chimneys
On the geniously conceived
habitations of death
When Israel's body drifted through the air
As smoke —
When it was welcomed by a chimney sweep
That was a star, a star that turned black
Or was it a sunray?

O the chimneys!
Freedomways for Jeremiah's and Job's dust —
Who conceived you and laid stone upon stone
The way for refugees of smoke?

O the habitations of death,
Invitingly appointed
For the host who used to be a guest —
O you fingers
Laying a threshold
Like a knife between life and death.

O you chimneys
O you fingers
And Israel's body as smoke through the air.

Perhaps the most poignant comment on Sachs' Holocaust poetry was made in an open letter to her by the German-Jewish poet Hilde Domain, who also suffered through the nightmare. Domain speaks of the post-war photographs of concentration camps showing grotesque piles of corpses, with the dead resembling horribly twisted puppets. Not until 15 years later when she began to read the poetry of Sachs were the dead buried for Domain and transformed into the memories of the departed that people normally have.

A second volume of Sachs' poetry Eclipse of the Stars was published in 1949 and a third And No One Knows Where to Go appeared in 1957. A copy of the play Eli found its way to West Germany, where it was presented on two West German radio stations in 1958 and produced on stage in Dortmund in 1962. This exposure created an interest in Sachs' work in Germany. Because of her message of reconciliation, very evident in her fourth volume of poetry Flight and Metamorphosis, her faith in Germany's younger generation and her contribution to the literature of her native language, Sachs received several prestigious literary awards in Germany in the '60s.

In 1965, when she received the Peace Prize of German Publishers, Sachs addressed her acceptance remarks to young Germans:

"In spite of all the horrors of the past, I believe in you," she said. "Together, full of grief, let us remember the victims, and then let us walk together into the future to seek again and again a new beginning."

Ironically, her fame as winner of many literary awards made her a target of anti-Semitic invective and threats — a target both real and imagined. Her persecution mania led her to spend nearly three years in a mental sanatorium. She saw herself again as a Jew who was once again persecuted and a representative of all persecuted Jews. As a result she interceded on Eichman's behalf as a gesture of reconciliation, but also out of fear of retaliatory measures.

The climax of Sachs' career came when she received the Nobel Prize on Dec. 10, 1966, which happened to coincide with her 75th birthday. Still feeling the persecuted Jew, she asked for permission from the Swedish office of personal records to erase the fear-instilling name Sara, which she had been forced to adopt before she left Germany. She received this permission, just before the prize ceremony took place!

The flurry of worldwide interest following her receipt of the Nobel Prize had abated by the time of Sachs' death four years later. Since then she has lapsed into relative obscurity again, especially in English speaking countries. Sachs continues to have a wider readership in Europe, however.

Perhaps her achievements can best be summed up in the words of Harry Zohn in Congress Bi-Weekly: "To the millions of nameless and voiceless who are generally recalled only in the form of merciless, six-digit figures, Nelly Sachs has given mouth and voice."

School expands Israel's horizons

It isn't easy to translate the changing political realities of the Middle East into opportunities for communication and education. But a new graduate school of management in Tel Aviv aims to do just that. The Tel Aviv International School of Management (TISOM) is an international school, rooted in the Middle East, that seeks to prepare young managers for the challenges of a multicultural business environment. Studies are conducted in English. In its first year, TISOM has attracted students from 12 diverse countries and territories.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

TISOM was the product of a vision shared by a group of Israeli and Canadian investors and has an international faculty of the first order. Its dean, Prof. Meinhoff Dierkes, was the first president of Germany's leading social research institute, the Wissenschaftszentrum. Dierkes, who had never visited Israel before he came to TISOM, was moved by the potential inherent in looking at the Middle East, for the first time, as an economic region. His belief in helping to create an international network of managers who would share an understanding of region, but also of their respective cultural perspectives, motivated Dierkes to take a leave of absence from his duties in Germany, and to move to Tel Aviv.

Prof. Moshe Many, president of TISOM, served as president of Tel Aviv University between 1983 and 1991. Today, he says, "Following my eight years as president of Israel's public university, I can fully appreciate the advantages private university education offers its students. TISOM has been able to build upon the experience and vision of the world's leading business schools."

But the most exciting aspect of TISOM is its student body. The foreign students hail from as far away as Canada, China, Taiwan, Indonesia, the Philippines, India and Kenya, and as near as Oman, Morocco and the Palestinian Authority. Most of these students have experience in business and management and were attracted by the idea of an international environment in the heart of Tel Aviv.

Friendships have already developed among young people who would otherwise have known little about one another. "I now feel like I have a friend in almost every country in the world," says Xiaoqing Chen.

The backgrounds of these young people are fascinating, precisely because they seem so far removed from the reality of Israel. Yogesh Shah is an engineer from Bombay, who is a partner in an engineering firm with an annual turnover of $1 million. Wahana Landung is a computers engineer from Indonesia. Jim Levy, from Toronto, is a lawyer with a PhD in environmental sudies, who is now studying for his MBA. Eid Al-Balushi is a banker from Oman, and is the first Omani student to study in an Israeli university. Rowan Faqih is a researcher for a management consulting firm in Ramallah, in the West Bank.

The Israeli students, in turn, chose TISOM because of the exposure it offered them to students from around the world, thereby broadening their own horizons. The Israelis, many of them mature students, all have experience in industry, real estate, the IDF or consulting. "As a career officer in the IDF, I was involved in the peace talks with the Palestinians, in which we tried to shape a new political future for the region," says Ivri Verbin. "TISOM is a natural place for me to pursue graduate studies."

The cross-cultural "laboratory" is completed by an academic faculty from Canada, the United States, Europe and Asia. Prof. Charles Mayer, also of Toronto, says, "TISOM's student body is unique in its maturity, intellectual curiosity, entrepreneurship and cross-cultural experience. It's the most international group I have ever worked with."

Shimon Peres' vision of "a new Middle East" has been debated and sometimes criticized as being unrealistic. It is clear, however, that a new reality is emerging in the region. The students, faculty and investors in TISOM would not be there if they did not see and feel the new reality in which they study and teach. The people behind TISOM had a long-term vision — the development of a new generation of business managers with an expertise in the Middle East, who themselves would represent a challenge in bridgebuilding. They knew that a commitment to a new way of doing business could itself contribute to greater economic stability, and that these new networks of people had to be created where they did not exist. In its own way, the TISOM experiment may contribute as much to the development of a new Middle East as ongoing talks between governments.

Nahal pioneers a new direction

The name Nahal may not mean anything to friends and observers overseas, but every Israeli is familiar with it. In 1949, as the Israel army began to absorb large numbers of new immigrants, it was realized that in addition to their functions in the defence of the country, the armed forces also had to serve as an educational element in introducing the newcomers into the life and spirit of the land. Those were still days of pioneering idealism, and so Nahal was born.

By Carl Alpert in Israel

The name is a Hebrew acronym for Pioneering Fighting Youth. Those accepted in its ranks served for 40 months rather than the usual 36-month conscription period. Two-thirds of the time was spent in the usual military training, and much of the remainder in kibbutzim or development towns. The intention was to expose these young people to agricultural pioneering in the hope that many of them would elect kibbutz life after demobilization. As a matter of fact, fewer than 20 percent did, but the map of Israel is dotted with over 100 settlements set up by Nahal graduates.

Through the years, recruiting for Nahal met with diminishing success. Though its ranks were open to youth from all elements of the community, fewer and fewer were attracted by the "vision" of life or even service on a kibbutz. Army authorities pondered. Should Nahal be discontinued?

Then came a new idea. Pioneering these days is taking on different forms. The economic base of the country is no longer agricultural. Nor is the collective life of the kibbutz considered the ideal. Israel is entering the 21st century as an industrial state. The pioneers are those with ideas and initiative who can create export-oriented industries. They are the ones who chart new paths to national prosperity and personal success. Why not utilize the Nahal framework to direct young men and women, after they complete their army service, into these channels of the new economy?

Three experimental groups were set up, drawn largely from young people in border villages or development towns, where their civil opportunities were limited. Their external service, while they were still in uniform, was spent, not in milking cows or plowing the fields, but in listening to 300 hours of lectures on financial administration, pricing and marketing. They got practical experience, not on farms, but as "cadets" with existing industrial enterprises. All this was presented in the spirit of facing up to the realism of the modern economy and with a sense of ideological motivation in advancing the welfare of the country as a whole.

The program was not confined to lectures. At the proper stage, the young soldiers engaged in what has aptly been compared to a Monopoly game. They produced ideas for products. On paper they set up production firms. They did market surveys. They faced problems of obtaining credit. They grappled with personnel problems and studied merchandising methods. In short, they were "in business."

The laws of economics are inexorable, especially under the eagle eye of the skilled officers in charge. Some of the brain children quickly spun into dizzying bankruptcy. With the experience gained, they made new efforts.

The Ministry of Trade and Industry is providing the extra financing required for the course.

No one expects that this program can possibly replace the conventional college or university, but it is an experiment in uncovering talents of young people who might never have entered academic channels, all against the background of regular army duty, basic training, use of weapons, field service. One program has now been completed and the 27 members discharged. Hopefully, many will return to their home towns to set up a business and provide local employment. Two other groups are still doing military service and "playing Monopoly." The army authorities refrain from painting any optimistic pictures. They are reconciled to the fact that at first many will follow the backpacking treks to the Far East or the jungles of South America, in the now standard tradition of army dischargees. But when they return and face the need to become part of society, will they fulfil the high expectation of the new program which is aptly termed Entrepreneurial Nahal?

Word has gotten around and urban youth have begun to apply for enrolment in the Nahal framework. It will be at least a year or more before the results can be analyzed and the success of the program judged. If it continues, the goal of Nahal graduates will no longer be "Let's set up a kibbutz," but "Let's set up a business!"

Morton's Weinfeld's column will return next month in this space.

Rediscovering Heinrich Heine

This year will see not only the 100th anniversary of the Basel Conference at which political Zionism was founded by Theodor Herzl, but also the 200th anniversary of the birth of one of the most controversial Jews of the modern era. He was Heinrich Heine, born in Dusseldorf as Hayyim son of Samson Heine. By the time he died, at the age of only 59, he had become Germany's most famous lyrical poet, and some decades later a statistician noted that German and Austrian composers had produced no fewer than 4,000 musical settings for his poems.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Born and raised as a Jew, interested in his early years in promoting Jewish culture, he left his faith in order to advance himself — but succeeded neither in the hoped-for appointment nor in his apostasy. He once said that he greatly regretted having been baptized, but that he did not bother to return to his ancestral faith because in effect he had never left it. Many of his stories have become classics, especially The Rabbi of Bacharach. The German governments of his time were suspicious of his highly critical essays, in one of which he predicted that the time would come when the Germans would do away with the Jews. Yet the German people embraced him and especially one of his poems called Lorelei, a song about a rock on the Rhine whose muse endangers the passer-by with her seductive song.

To this day, the poem is reckoned to be the most popular in German history. Even Hitler could not suppress it, although all publishers were instructed not to credit Heine with the authorship but to note instead that it was composed by "an anonymous author."

Heine felt in fact rejected by a world that was not attuned to his genius and he eventually became an exile, living in Paris where he died and was buried in a non-denominational cemetery.

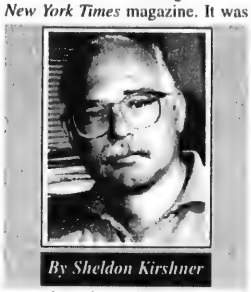
The new Germany has rediscovered this enigmatic figure and, after 33 years of scholarly effort, a new edition of his 7,000 surviving manuscripts has been published in 16 volumes. The city of his birth had denied his due for a long time and as late as 1953, hid his monument in a far-off corner of a seldom visited park. But since then he has been fully rehabilitated and Dusseldorf's university is now named after him.

The German government will issue a special memorial coin, and the Goethe-Institute is sponsoring a worldwide travelling exhibit about him. Even the City of New York boasts a statue of him, acquired by German Americans some years ago when Heine had become unpopular in his native country.

My father fancied the enigmatic poet and encouraged me to read as many of his works as possible. From my youth on, I was impressed with the tragedy of a Jew who chose not to be a Jew, yet who in his innermost being had never changed his identity. It was a lesson I never forgot, especially so in the days of the Nazis who both wanted to ensure that we Jews remained who we were and yet wanted to rob us of the very life we called our own.

The Kirshner File

Madeleine Albright's missing component



By Sheldon Kirshner

Less than a year ago, I read a rather lengthy article about Madeleine Albright in the New York Times magazine. It was an exhaustive piece, yet one important component was missing: her Jewishness.

There were references to her Czech nationality, but nary a word regarding her Jewish background. It seemed an exceedingly strange omission. Why, in an era when Jews had achieved widespread acceptance and prominence in the United States, was Albright concealing her origins?

Since her appointment as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations some years ago, I had been following the arc of her life quite closely. I was aware that her father, Josef Korbel, had been a Czech diplomat before and after World War II, a position few Jews attained. I knew that her family had fled Czechoslovakia in the wake of the German invasion and had returned in 1945, only to leave permanently with the accession of communism.

The fact that the Korbels had left Prague in the first place alerted me to the possibility that they were probably Jewish. Who but Jews would have emigrated from Europe as the Nazi plague spread?

With the announcement that she would succeed Warren Christopher as secretary of state, the spate of rumors about Albright's religious affiliation escalated. Finally, in February, the Washington Post cleared the air once and for all. Albright, born Marie Jana Korbel, was indeed ethnically Jewish, but Catholic by upbringing and Protestant by conversion through a marriage.

Josef Korbel and his wife, Mandula Spiegel, converted to Christianity early in the war while living in exile in Britain. By all accounts, they never revealed the family secret to their children, and Albright became a practicing Christian.

The Korbels, in common with a significant number of highly assimilated Jews, converted to Christianity as the tide of Nazism rose. Their apostasy was not unusual. In a reaction to anti-Semitism, and in attempt to improve their social and economic standing, Jews throughout the ages had taken the same route: Pablo Christiani in Spain, Rachel Varnhagen in Germany, Jacob Brafman in Russia and Hugh Montefiore in Britain. Conversion, as Heinrich Heine succinctly put it, was the price of admission to European society.

Albright claims that her parents never informed her that they were ethnically Jewish, and this may well be true. But I find it incredulous that a woman of her intellectual calibre and integrity accepted her parents' tall tale at face value. Was she not curious about their actual past as the evidence of their original Jewishness piled up? Was she ashamed of their Jewishness?

And once the undisputable facts of the case emerged, Albright muddied the waters. "I was not surprised about my Jewish origin," she told a Washington Post reporter. "What surprised me was that my grandparents died in concentration camps." But shortly afterward, in a CBS television interview, she averred that her family's Jewishness and her grandparents' fate had been "totally" unknown to her.

Clearly, Albright couldn't get her story straight.

She should have known better. Between 1994 and 1996, the mayor of Letohrad — Josef Korbel's Bohemian birthplace — sent Albright three letters outlining her lineage. She did not reply to any of them. Furthermore, she rejected overtures from Dagmar Sima, her Jewish cousin in the Czech Republic. One might conclude that Albright was simply embarrassed by her Jewish roots.

Last month, Albright finally came clean after receiving "fairly compelling" information about her family's antecedants. And two weeks ago, in another admission, she told New York Times columnist Frank Rich that she "had not been sensitive enough to signs that my background was different than I thought it was." She added, "I'm deeply hurt that people think I'm lying."

I will not accuse Albright of being a liar, but I am skeptical about her sincerity. Prior to the latest disclosures, she had every opportunity to get to the bottom of the matter. But, for reasons best known to herself, she skirted the issue, an element of her very identity. Could it have been a deliberate decision?

Religion is a personal matter and should play absolutely no role in a person's qualification for public office. Nevertheless, the Albright affair remains unsettling. It is a forceful reminder of the terrible psychological toll the Holocaust exacted on some assimilated Jews. It is a commentary on the residual effects of anti-Semitism, on Jewish self-hatred (a not uncommon phenomenon) and on Albright herself.

Will the real Madeleine Albright please stand up?

Jewish mobsters

My son the gangster? Seventy years ago, when organized crime reigned supreme in the United States, Jewish mothers might not have looked askance at such an appellation. High-profile criminals, including Jewish ones, were glamorized by a fawning press and by a succession of Hollywood films. No wonder they were regarded with a measure of fascination by the masses.

This thought occurred to me as I watched Empire of Crime: A Century of the New York Mob on the A&E television channel last week. The two-hour documentary did not break new ground with respect to the proliferation of Jewish mobsters in the 1920s, 1930s and 1940s. Nevertheless, it was illuminating.

Being historically accurate, the film concentrated on the Sicilian mafia, which dominated the underworld during the Prohibition era. But Jews such as Arnold ("Brains") Rothstein, Meyer Lansky, Benjamin Siegel and Louis ("Lepke") Buchalter were hardly insignificant figures in the annals of criminaldom.

More often than not the children of East European immigrants, they emerged at a time when the Jewish community in New York City was plagued by poverty and inhibited by anti-Semitism. The prototypical Jewish gangster gradually vanished from the scene as blatant discrimination lessened and as Jews prospered and were increasingly accepted by their fellow Americans. But of late, with the arrival of a multitude of Russian immigrants to America, a few of whom have turned to crime, the pendulum seems to have swung the other way.

Goodbye, Maurice

Maurice Lucow, the former editor of The Canadian Jewish News, died last week in Victoria, B.C. I knew him and I mourn his passing. He was dedicated, innovative and valued good work. He turned The CJN into a tabloid, computerized its operations and broadened its coverage of national and international news. An old-fashioned newspaperman, Maurice was even-tempered, but could be irascible and ornery. I will miss him. Goodbye, Maurice.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Changing your life

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

"I feel so strongly about being Jewish and yet my kids don't have much use for Judaism." This is part of a heartfelt letter I received from someone not long ago. And though my sympathies run deep for this parent, her emphasis on feeling Jewish is, ironically, part of the whole problem.

As if intuiting our letter writer's dilemma, the Torah conveys a profound message to the Jewish people in Deuteronomy, Chapter Four: "Keep [the commandments] and do them, for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the eyes of the other nations, who shall hear all these statutes and say, surely this great nation is a wise and discerning people."

Now honestly, have you ever heard something so peculiar? Are you telling me that by observing Shabbat and eating matzah on Passover, that the gentiles will be impressed by this? Don't we secretly suspect that non-Jews will view all of this ritual as quaint at best and irrelevant at worst, but certainly not wise and understanding? And in our day and age, of course, it is not the skepticism of our gentile neighbors we fear, but that of our children.

Yet for Maimonides, this verse was the essence of Judaism, because it stated that, by definition, Judaism must make sense. He believed that the survival of Jewish ideas and practices was precisely because of their universal and rational character, their relevance in any time period. For Maimonides if you don't have religious system which lends itself to rational interpretation and can be communicated to other people — to anyone — then you don't have anything more than ethnicity. And for him, Judaism transcended ethnicity.

So Maimonides understood these Biblical verses as an injunction to communicate Judaism, not just as a feeling, but as a deep way of explaining reality in all of its facets. Because although our feelings of Jewish pride are absolutely genuine and praiseworthy, feeling is often a difficult thing to transfer. I've heard many Jewish people recall the allegiance of their grandfathers to a Torah way of life, and feel no compulsion to follow in those footsteps. Other people's emotional attachments don't necessarily become ours. We live in a "post-everything" world — post-Enlightenment, post-Freudian, post-feminist, post-Holocaust. There is no turning back from these developments, no way to simply close our eyes to them. It thus becomes even more incumbent upon us to show our children how Judaism can stand strong in the winds of intellectual and moral change.

So that when we sit down at our seder tables not long from now, let's engage our children in a discussion about what matzah, for example, really means. Because it cannot be simply that "the Jews didn't have time to wait for the bread to rise." You are slaves for hundreds of years but you cannot stop an extra few minutes to make bread? Here, in this seeming absurdity, we see a fundamental Jewish idea. If you have a chance to be free, to grow spiritually, to develop emotionally, don't put it off, not even for an instant. Imagine a slave coming out of Egypt saying, "yes I'd like to escape barbarism and tyranny but I can't leave until I have my nine-grain bread." Judaism teaches us not to be scared to take a chance on inner growth, and that the only thing more frightening than changing your life and questing for spiritual meaning is not changing it, an idea that is true for every person, every generation, everywhere.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

From Aaron to Zusya

The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion*, edited by R.J. Zwi Werblowsky and Geoffrey Wigdor (Oxford University Press, $185).

This attractive, well-produced tome of over 750 pages is the most complete one-volume resource available for information on the concepts, beliefs and practices of Judaism, in the past and today. It contains 2,400 alphabetically arranged entries from "Aaron" to "Zusya of Hanipoli."

The two well-known Israeli editors who compiled a similar work about 30 years ago have now been aided, in this largely revised edition, by over 150 Israeli, American and European scholars whose names are attached to the individual articles.

Features of the dictionary include profiles of important figures in Jewish history from Moses to the present; balanced accounts of all religious movements from various forms of Orthodoxy to Jewish humanism; a consideration of religious issues posed by the State of Israel and useful up-to-date bibliographies after each entry.

Casual browsing provided unusual information on a variety of subjects:

• Golem. "The word golem occurs once in the Bible (Ps. 139:16) and there refers to an embryo; in medieval Hebrew the word used to mean formless matter but later came to refer to a robot magically created. A man made of clay was brought to life by the insertion of a slip of paper with one of the mystic names of God under his tongue," A rabbi of Amsterdam seriously discussed whether a golem might be counted for the religious quorum of 10. He indicated that his grandfather had once fashioned such a creature.

• Had Gadya. "This Aramaic poem with 10 stanzas is recited at the close of the Pesach seder service. Resembling a German folk song and composed on the cumulative pattern known to English readers from The House that Jack Built, it was written by an unknown author, probably in the 15th century, and may have been included in the Haggadah in order to amuse the children who were kept up late." Many interpretations have been advanced for Had Gadya. According to the mystics, it describes the experiences of the soul in the human body from birth to Judgement Day.

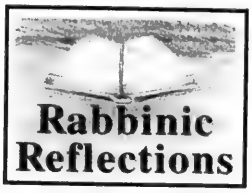
• Organ. "The Talmud and other ancient sources provide descriptions of an organ-like instrument called the magrefah that was said to have been used in the Jerusalem Temple. It is considered by most to have been a sort of water-powered organ ...In the aftermath of the Temple's destruction, however, the rabbis instituted a state of mourning and proscribed the use of the magrefah and all other instruments in synagogues." As a result, instrumental music was absent from the synagogue service as it developed in the Middle Ages.

• Holy City. "The traditional term for Jerusalem...beginning in the 17th century, three other cities in Erets Yisra'el came to be regarded as holy — Hebron, because of its association with the patriarchs and matriarchs; Tiberias, because it had become the religious focus of the country after the Bar Kokhba Revolt; and Safed, because it was the centre of the kabbalists in the 16th century."

• Celibacy. "The idea that a person ought not to marry is entirely foreign to Judaism." Traditionally an unmarried person was debarred from high religious and judicial office. No Jewish moralist has ever encouraged celibacy. Here there is a marked difference between Jewish values and those of Christianity.

Unfortunately, the book's price will discourage individual purchasers, but, authoritative and invaluable, it belongs in every congregational and institutional library.

Jewish Life



Everything we do has a divine purpose

By RABBI IRVIN S. BEIGEL

One of the sources of unhappiness in life is the feeling that our labors have no meaning. We work hard, but like the cog in the wheel, we do not see significance in what we do. The man who spends 25 years working on an assembly line, inserting one screw over and over again, does not see the connection between his action and the brand new car that leaves the factory.

Our ancestors may have experienced similar feelings about their contributions to the Mishkan, the portable Tabernacle whose completion is described in this week's Torah reading. The people at large donated materials; the artisans made the structure, the furnishings and even the priestly vestments. Until Moses erected the structure, they could not see the finished product. They could not understand that they were building a sanctuary that would be a constant reminder of G-d's presence amidst the people.

It is for this reason that Parshat Pekudei repeats the phrase "as the Lord commanded Moses" 18 times. The people are reminded that the plan they were so faithfully executing was G-d's plan.

The rabbis compare this to a king who commanded his servant to build him a palace. On every part that he built, he wrote the name of the king. The Torah is stressing that even if things are done by human hands, they are the result of G-d's effort and they can fulfil His purpose in the world.

The people might have seen their labors in building the Mishkan as routine and mundane. The truth was that these rather usual acts had a divine purpose — they provided the visible symbol of G-d's presence in their camp.

Our ordinary labors in life can also seem to lack significance and purpose. We, too, like our ancestors, have the power to take our routine work and raise it to a higher level. We do so by recognizing that everything we do has a divine purpose. Every human activity can play some part in fulfilling G-d's plans for us and for the world. Every action can potentially bring the Divine presence into our lives.

A similar thought is contained in the verse from Deuteronomy which is recited following Sh'ma Yisrael, "You shall love the Lord, your G-d, with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your might." This verse suggests that every aspect of our being, every human activity ought to be directed to G-d.

Directed to the right goals, everything we do can bring glory to G-d and bring about tikkun olam b'malchut Shaddai — the perfection of the world under the rule of the Almighty. Seen in this light every human action is important.

Purim's a time to laugh

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: What is the proper blessing to recite before logging on to the Internet?

Answer: "Modem anachnu lach..."

Oy!

It's well known that once the month of Adar is upon us, we are supposed to increase our happiness. Well, Adar is here (actually the second month of Adar) and in anticipation of Purim, it's time for my first ever survey of Jewish humor on the Internet.

First, a disclaimer. The late, beloved Jewish humorist Leo Rosten said "Humor is the affectionate communication of insight." Unfortunately, humor on the Internet can be much less than affectionate. I have tried to recommend sites which will entertain, but due to the changing nature of the World Wide Web, you never really know what you're going to come across. Which is a long way of saying the humor lane on the Jewish Highway can get quite bumpy. You've been warned.

The best place to start your quest is at Marty Weiss' Jewish Humor List Home Page [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/lists/jewish-humor/index.htm].

There, you can find the link to his large archives of jokes. And you'll find out how you can get a big batch of Jewish jokes delivered to your e-mailbox on the first of every month. The Jewish Communication Network offers its own Forum on Jokes and Humor at [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/forum/forum.idc?ForumID=14&TopicID=4].

Both of these sites also welcome your submissions if you have a joke that you're dying to share. Another resource for humor on the Internet is the [news:rec.humor.funny] newsgroup. To find Jewish jokes that have appeared there in the past, go to the newsgroup archives at [http://www.clari.net/rhf/search.html] and search for words such as "Jew" or "Israel."

What would Israeli humor be without Dry Bones? Through thick and thin, Yaakov Kirschen, the cartoonist behind the syndicated political comic strip has always helped Israelis find a humorous lining in their various clouds. The Dry Bones Cartoon Gallery offers a very generous selection of Kirschen's cartoons [http://drybones.org.il/GALLERY.HTML].

Not quite as famous, Ohr Somayach Yeshivah tries its hand at cartooning with ChoppedLiver [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/judaism/cartoons/cartoons.htm].

The Yeshivah even offers its own Top Ten Lists [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/judaism/humor/top10/topten.htm].

For example, Reason Number 10 for Not Attending Synagogue on Shabbat: "I heard this Torah reading last year." The Jewish Communications Network goes two better with its Top 12 lists at [http://www.jcn18.com/top12.htm]

Over at the University of Pennsylvania, some industrious students have assembled several humorous articles at [http://dolphin.upenn.edu/~ocp/TXT/MYST_ARC]. In the Minyan Penal Code, they address the decorum problem that plagues many Orthodox congregations by recommending a violation and fine schedule. Sample violations and fines: "taking seat of person called to Torah: Fine-$72; taking seat of Rabbi during speech: Fine-$360 (fine waived if speech is longer than 30 minutes)."

Also worth a look is David Bader's unique demystification of the Jewish Year, its feasts and fasts at The Yo-Yo Diet Guide to the Jewish Holidays [http://www.extremely.com/yoyodiet.html].

If you like your humor right-to-left and particularly if you're a teacher, then try the Hebrew language site Chinuch b'Chiyuch (Education with a Smile) [http://www.jercol.macam98.ac.il/daat/chiyuch/chiyuch.htm]. There you'll find links to cartoons, riddles and jokes about education. A sample: Child handing in test paper to teacher: "I left in a few mistakes to see if you could find them." You will need to have Hebrew fonts installed in your browser in order to read this site.

Well, that's about it for this year but before I go, I'll leave you with this late-breaking Jewish Internet news story that you may have missed.

Did you know that World Wide Web giants Yahoo and Netscape have announced a surprise merger and relocation. The new firm will move to Israel and call itself Net'n'Yahoo.

Yahoo, indeed. Have a Very Happy Purim!

Arab state needed as result of demographic changes: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Idealistic slogans must not be allowed to detract Jews from realities surrounding the need for peace in the Middle East, asserts Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, general studies principal of Eitz Chaim Schools.

These realities, he said at a recent lecture at the Mizrachi Bayit, are that in not too many years, the Arab population will almost certainly overtake the Jewish, and that new military technology obviates the necessity of using land as security.

The Arab population in Israel, he said, has increased steadily, and at a much greater rate than that of the Jewish population.

"In the 1967 census, it was found that the Arab population in Israel, Gaza and the territories was 50 percent of the Jewish population. Today, 30 years later, it is 58 percent.

"Without immigration from Russia and South Africa, which won't be much of a factor in the future, they would comprise 70 percent."

In less than 70 years, he predicted flatly, should Israel keep Gaza and the territories, it won't be a Jewish state but an Arab one.

He slammed those who claim that the Arabs will be controlled by withholding the vote from them. "You can't do that. Israel is the only democracy that deprives a portion of its population of the vote. The only other one was South Africa, a country four times as big, with lots of natural resources.

"When the United Nations applied sanctions, South Africa was on its knees in three years. Israel couldn't withstand sanctions for three months."

The Arab population under Israeli control must not be allowed to increase, he said, noting that "if they have 30 percent of the vote, they can control the government and its military secrets."

Israel, he said, must not take over places with an Arab majority. "We must make a border, and keep them out. There must be an Arab state outside of Israel to absorb the Arabs, and we must make it a requirement that any Israel Arab who wishes can live there."

As well, he said, "Israel must induce as many to leave as possible."

Acknowledging that although it sounds racist, "We want a Jewish state. Arab emigration is essential for Israel's survival."

If the peace process fails, he warned, "everything that has been accomplished in the last three years will be reversed — it will lead to another Israel-Arab war."

He slammed those who say that because Israel has always won its wars, it will continue to do so. Scud missiles can be launched far enough from the Israeli border, that they can "wreak so much damage on the civilian population, that all Israel's technological strength will have no effect [against them]."

Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits

The winner of such a war, he said, "is the one with the biggest and most spread out population. The Arabs have three hundred times more area, even if you don't include Iran, and a much bigger population."

Quoting portions of the Bible where the children of Israel were told several times not to do battle because the odds were against them, Rabbi Jakobovits said that even the Bible, "is concerned not just with land but with reality."

Israel already has 60 percent more land than they had in the Bible. "Biblical borders were from Dan to Beersheva — we already control from Dan to Eilat."

Opponents of the peace process say that the Arabs want all of Palestine. "Sure they do," the rabbi said. "Don't we?"

Yasser Arafat desperately needs peace, whatever he says to his own followers, since he realizes that "the Arab world doesn't care about him, the Palestinians have never been on good terms with other Arabs, and he doesn't have the means to win a war," Rabbi Jakobovits said.

But it must be a "worthwhile peace, with both sides reasonably satisfied."

Purim was Bubbie's favorite holiday

By ARNOLD R. GLICK
Special to The CJN

When one thinks of Jewish holidays that foster family togetherness, several come readily to mind.

Passover, of course, is a time when family members gather together, often arriving from great distances, to perform the seder rituals and enjoy a sumptuous meal.

Rosh Hashanah unites the generations of a family in the sharing of hopes and wishes for the coming year.

Guest Voices

And Chanukah is often the occasion of a family party, when the children run around with dreidels in one hand and chocolate coins in the other while the adults get down to the task of latke eating.

But for my Bubbie Lena — my father's mother — the holiday that was her favorite was Purim.

Of course, in contrast to Passover, Rosh Hashanah, and Chanukah — which continue on for two days or longer and which are well-known even to those outside of the Jewish community — Purim might seem a bit pale as a favorite holiday. It is a date on the calendar that is unfamiliar to many.

But Purim is a happy holiday — commemorating a historical event when wrong was righted — and joy and celebration comprise its flavor. And, no doubt, the happy tone of the holiday is part of what my Bubbie Lena enjoyed.

But the real reason that Purim was her favorite is that for Bubbie Lena this was the one holiday when all of her children and grandchildren could come to her home to be together. My father was one of nine brothers and sisters, and as they married and raised families of their own they settled in various communities around Boston and elsewhere in New England. Being a traditionally observant family, traveling on Shabbat and the major holidays was prohibited.

But on Purim — a holiday on which there are no restrictions prohibiting travel or other activities — all of Lena's children could take a drive to her house for a special festive Purim meal.

So each year Lena would look forward to the Purim gathering. She would prepare dozens and dozens of hamentaschen, the traditional-for-Purim triangular-shaped cookies filled with poppy seeds or fruit filling. The large dining table would be set, and additional places for the grandchildren would be arranged in the adjacent living room.

There is a tradition that throughout the month of Adar — the month on the Jewish calendar during which Purim falls — a person is supposed to be happy. As my Bubbie Lena's house would become filled with her children, their spouses, and the aineklach — the grandchildren, many still wearing their Purim costumes — Lena was happy that the family was together.

A time for family to get together

In 1958, my Bubbie Lena died. She died on Purim. And for many years to follow, her children would come together to mark her yarzheit.

And so, although there was now an element of sadness that became part of the family's Purim observance, it came to be that as a result of the date on which she died, Bubbie Lena ensured that the family gatherings which were so important to her during her life would continue after her death.

CARE FOR KIDS LAUNCHED

The Hospital for Sick Children recently honored chartered financial consultant and chartered life underwriter Sonny Goldstein for founding Care for Kids, a charity to raise funds to help parents provide palliative care in their homes for their terminally ill children. The charity, which so far has been largely funded by Goldstein himself, provides money for nurses and equipment so that these children can be cared for with dignity. A major fundraiser for Care for Kids is being planned. Pictured receiving a plaque in his honor is Sonny Goldstein (far left), his wife Edie, daughter Michelle, and Hospital for Sick Children representatives Maria Martin of the department of palliative care and Robin Gerlin, foundation development coordinator. Israeli teens share experiences with counterparts

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When members of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) met recently with two Israeli teens, they rapidly discovered that they lead similar yet quite different lives.

Erez Hybloom and Michal Neva, both 17, were in Toronto as part of a delegation of 62 Israeli youth who have set out to meet peers in Canada, Europe, the United States, South America, Africa, the Far East, Russia, Australia and New Zealand.

The annual program, initiated by Israel in 1973, aims to establish a dialogue and foster better understanding between youth worldwide. Teens selected represent a cross-section of Israeli youth, whether secular, religious, Israeli-born or immigrant.

In a meeting room at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, the Israeli pair began by treading on familiar territory, like school, sports, driver's licences, part-time jobs, music and friends. The local teens nodded as they identified with the daily lives of their counterparts.

It was when Hybloom mentioned the main difference — the fact that all Israelis go to the army after high school — that the questions began flying.

The first draft notice comes when youth are in Grade 11, he told the group, and that is when they make arrangements for the testing and personal interviews.

"The results of these logic tests, similar to SATs, indicate what we will do in the army. Pilots, for example, are considered the elite and they need the highest profile," he said.

Males typically enlist for three years, he said, but because of the long training period needed to become a pilot, they are often in the army for as long as seven years. "They are happy to have the opportunity to be a pilot."

Asked what girls do in the army, Neva replied that while they do not fight, they are trained to be "the women behind the men." Army intelligence is considered the top post for girls, she said.

The pair agreed that in Israel, "we grow up with the knowledge that the army is part of our lives. Girls may do such service as working in a hospital but everyone does something."

Hybloom said Israeli youth appreciate how much the army gives them. "We will make our best friends there, we will be taught skills and most of all, we will grow up. We will leave the army as a different person. These are things that people in other countries do not get."

Israeli youth, he said, spend free time playing sports, listening to music or just visiting with friends. They are also a major part of the part-time workforce, and starting at age 15, they may work at such places as fast food restaurants or stores.

"They are very involved in politics whether it is on the student council or youth councils in their own area or countrywide. Kids talk a lot about politics and they help out in the elections – they care," he said.

Just like everywhere else, added Neva, drugs are a problem, "and many teens are involved in 'say no to drugs' campaign."

Safety, they stressed, is not an issue. "When there is a series of bombs, we may get nervous, but it does not take over our lives. We become more alert and aware but it does not prevent us from doing anything," said Hybloom.

TEENS TEACH ENGLISH IN ISRAEL

Canadian Young Judaea recently initiated a pilot volunteer program called Kesher (the Hebrew word for link). Toronto students, from left, Evan Pilz, Jessica Labi, Sheri Chaim and Michelle Nagi, along with Kerri Joffe (not shown), are in Beersheva helping Israeli teachers with students who have difficulty in English. The Toronto students all finished high school in mid-year.

Kuti Gershoni. Sheer Determination.

'Do you know how I deal with the frustration of my disabilities? I jog myself to exhaustion.' says Kuti Gershoni.

On November 2, 1969, Kuti was summoned to dismantle a mine. As he carefully lowered himself to the ground, there was an earsplitting noise. Kuti felt like he was hit by an express train. Everything was pitch dark ... he could not see or hear ... except for a shrieking sound that filled the air. Both hands were blown off; he was blinded, his hearing was irreparably damaged. Life would never be the same again.

But Kuti is a fighter and was determined not to give up. After extensive surgery he began his rehabilitation at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. Together with the support of his wife and family, he received his Ph.D from Hebrew University, where he is now head of Eastern and African Studies. Kuti is currently a visiting Professor at Boston University.

'Society forgets and doesn't know how to deal with the disabled' he says. 'It was only at Beit Halochem that I could go with my family, and together, I could learn to be a whole person again.'

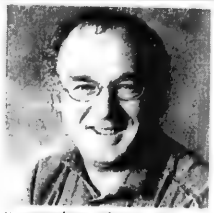
זכות ההצבעה לישראלים בחו"ל:



כפי שהבטחתי, הינה המשך מבחר תגובותיכם בעניין זכות ההצבעה לישראל בחו"ל, כפי שהוצעה בכנסת. אם בא לכם להגיב- אל תחססו. אני מבטיח לפרסם הכל.

"כל אחד שיושב מחוץ לישראל חגיע לכאן מרצונו. (אף אחד לא גירש אותו מהארץ). אבל עם החלטתנו לגור כאן, השארנו בארץ את זכותנו להחליט מה יהיו גורלה, החלטותיה או בקיצור את זכות ההצבעה. דרכון ישראלי מקנה לנו את הזכות לחזור חביתה מתי שרק נרצה, בלי שאלות ובלי שום נקודות עונשין על כך שפעם חשבנו אחרת. אני רואה בהחזקת הדרכון הישראלי זכות גדולה. ומוקירת תודה על כך שגם ילדי שנולדו פה מחזיקים בדרכון ישראלי. אף אחד לא רוצה שמישהו אחר ינהל לו את החיים בשלט רחוק. ולכן לנו היושבים כאן נשאר להחזיק אצבעות לארצנו ולכבד את החלטות האנשים שיושבים ושומרים לנו על המקלט הביתי. בברכה רחל שלטון"

"כל יהודי ישראלי אוהב את עמו וארצו, בין אם הוא חי בישראל או בחו"ל. מכך שהתשובה היא כן. מלבד זאת, רוב תושבי ישראל אינם משרתים בצה"ל, אינם משרתים במילואים ואינם שולחים את ילדיהם להילחם בגבול (ראו סטטיסטיקות בנושא). ב"גלובל-וולג'" שאנו חיים בו כיום אנשים זזים ממקום למקום בקנה מידה שלא נודע כמותו בהסטוריה. בשישראל תכיר בעבדות חיים אלו תוכלו לאמר שישראל התבררה ואין יותר מקום להכרזות ילדותיות כמו "נפולת של נמושות" (על פי יצחק רבין ז"ל).שלך יעקב הרשקוביץ."

"חשוב לזכור שישראלי הוא ישראלי באשר ילך. התחלקי של ויתור על אזרחות ישראלית הוא ארוך מסובך ומביש. אני הייתי מגביל את זכות ההצבעה לאזרחים שנושאים דרכון ישראלי בר תוקף לתקופה הרלוונטית מחשיבה הפשוטה שכדי להדש ראו להאריך את הדרכון יידרש אותו ישראלי להידרש בקונסוליה או בשגרירות במקום מגוריו, דבר שיעזור בין השאר בקיום קשר איתו. הרבה ישראלים אינם רשומים בנציגויות הישראליות ובכך הם מנותקי קשר עם ישראל מבחינת חוק. זאת אומרת כדי לקבל זכות זו צריך לעמוד בקריטריונים מסוימים. בעילום שם קורא ותיק."

"הטענה הנפוצה נגד מתן זכות הצבעה לישראלים בחו"ל הינה שהישראלים בחו"ל אינם שולחים את בניהם לצה"ל להגן על גבולות הארץ. כדאי להזכיר שישראלים צעירים רבים השוהים בחו"ל נוסעים לארץ לשרת בצה"ל, ביניהם כאלה שנולדו בחו"ל לחזורים בעלי אזרחות ישראלית. כמו כן כדאי להזכיר שציבור נכבד של בחורי ישיבות הגרים בארץ אינם משרתים בצה"ל ואינם הולכים לשרות מילואים, ובכל זאת הם זכאים לבחור ולהיבחר. ערביי ישראל בעלי אזרחות ישראלית אינם משרתים בצה"ל, ובכל זאת להם זכות הצבעה, ונבחריהם משמשים כחברי כנסת. חלק ממצביעי הימין מצביעים עפ"י תכתיב המגיע מחצרות הממוקמים למשל בברוקלין שכידוע זה חו"ל . לרבים מאנשי החצר אין אזרחות ישראלית והם אינם גרים בארץ, ובכל זאת דעתם נשמעת בקלפי. מי הם אלה התומכים והממנים הפיננסיים שמריצים מועמדים לבחירות לכנסת ולממשלה בארץ? לא קשה לנחש שחלק מהמימון נעשה על ידי מיליארדרים מחו"ל שלחלקם בוודאי אין אזרחות ישראלית. וכך בעל המאה הוא בעל הדעה. ומסתבר שלא חייבים להיות אזרחי ישראל ולגור בארץ כדי להשפיע על המדיניות שלה. מיכאל קאופמן" השבוע אבד לי הארנק... מכירים את ההרגשה הזו? לבטל את כל כרטיסי הפלסטיק, לעמוד בתור לרשיון נהיגה ושאר נירות. בקיצור שבוע מבאס לאללה. עברתי את זה כבר לפני שנתיים ולכן הפעם זה טיפה יותר קל. אז למה אני בכל זאת משתף אתכם בסיפור? כשסיפרתי על כך לאחת מהעובדות שלי בבית החולים היא השתתפה בצערי ואח"כ הוסיפה: "But think! it is all replacable", הכל ניתן להחלפה: פלסטיק חדש, רשיון חדש. מקבלים חדש שהוא זחה לישן. וכמה פעמים קמנו (ועוד נקום) למצוא שדברים שבאמת יקרים כמו, אנשים חבריות, הלכו לבלי שוב ואינם ניתנים להחלפה! והאם אנחנו מעריכים עכשיו את מה שיש לנו ואינו ניתן להחלפה? תחשבו על זה.

Sara Glickman celebrates 99 years in style

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sara Glickman was guest of honor at the "why-wait for-100?-birthday bash," marking her 99th birthday.

Glickman flew in from Montreal for the party, held recently at the home of her son and daughter-in law, Mort and Barbara Glickman.

Some 70 guests spanning four generations attended the party, including 20 Montreal residents. Among those Montrealers who made the trip west was Glickman's kid sister, Annie Goldberg, 95.

The highlight of the evening, was the screening of Mort's film, This is Your Century, Sara Glickman, a montage of still photographs and silent captions.

Fashionably dressed and looking years younger than her age, Glickman told The CJN she is "very proud" to be 99. "I don't mind getting older. I just don't want to get old."

Pointing to her head she said, "I don't feel any different [up here] than I did at 40, 50, 60 or 70." She stressed that she is grateful to be as mentally astute as ever.

Although her physical health has deteriorated, she said, she has learned to live with the changes and "take everything in stride."

"So you get a pain. At 99 I deserve it. You make the least you can of the aches and the pains...My eyes are getting dimmer. I don't begrudge them. They served their purpose perfectly."

In fact her eyes are still serving her well: she enjoys perusing the newspaper, which she reads without glasses.

Her sense of humor has helped her throughout her life, she noted. "Thank goodness I never lost my sense of humor...I didn't have an easy life, but I always made the best of the situation, even to this day. I laugh at things people cry about."

At the age of eight, Glickman, the oldest of six children, emigrated with her family from England. Her parents, originally from Russia, settled in Montreal, where her father manufactured and sold quilts out of his shop on the Main. Glickman left school early to work in the family business and she expressed great pride that she was able to educate herself.

She married Lazer Glickman, her parents' landsman, in 1920. He manufactured men's clothing while she stayed home to raise their four children: Elinor Solomon, Devina Hart, Morton and the late Sunny. There are nine grandchildren (one is deceased) and five great-grandchildren.

Glickman said she was always prepared to make sacrifices for her children, but expressing her love for them verbally was not a common practice in her day. "My children always came first. But I didn't use the word 'love' until my oldest son was 75. I told him I loved him. My generation wasn't accustomed to saying the word love."

She said she is "blessed" in having children who are devoted to her: her daughters, both Montreal residents, visit her at least once a day while Mort, her youngest son, calls daily from Toronto.

Widowed in 1978, Glickman enjoyed travelling — she visited Europe and Israel and until she was 95, wintered in Florida. Five years ago she moved from the family home on Pratt Avenue to the Montefiore, a retirement home in Cote St. Luc.

While she said there are no secrets to a long life she did say that she believed in exercise. She took daily walks and even used the stairs until she fell five months ago. Now she walks with a walker, which she calls her "cadillac."

Glickman's birthday parties have been an annual family tradition since she turned 90. The recent celebration was such a success, guests wondered if it could be topped, but Mort has already started planning for the next one, he said. His mother's dignity and humor are an inspiration to him and other family members, he said. "She has demonstrated to all of us that we can stay young while still growing old."

Beth Tzedec's 'Little Minyan' lets participants run the show

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Where might one expect to find Toronto's "Little Minyan?" Probably not at North America's largest Conservative congregation.

Then again, Beth Tzedec Congregation, with 2,800 member families, could be the logical place precisely because of its size.

The synagogue's Little Minyan, established about 18 months ago as a pilot project, will hold a final pilot service this Saturday morning before synagogue board members evaluate its viability.

"I think that a large synagogue can provide multiple entry paths into Jewish life," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of the congregation. "We're hoping [the Little Minyan] will become a regular part of the congregation's life."

The Little Minyan was initiated by members Eileen Silver and Ellen Kachuk Rosenbluth, following a discussion they had with Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who was most supportive of the idea.

"It's difficult to spend time in the sanctuary with little kids and 'shush' them all the time," said Kachuk Rosenbluth, Little Minyan committee member and mother of a 7-year-old and a 4-year-old. "We also wanted something less formal and more participatory for ourselves."

'Have a more haimish experience'

The first half-dozen Little Minyan services were held sporadically. To keep the momentum going, however, a spate of four was scheduled between mid-February and mid-March. They skipped only the Saturday of the congregation's monthly family service, held in the same main-floor chapel.

Unlike the family service, the Little Minyan is not child-centred, although children are included, said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, who was hired by the synagogue last year. The service has drawn about 80 people, a mix of families and singles.

Although the Little Minyan, like the family service, falls under Rabbi Tanenbaum's aegis, the service is run by participants, three of whom share the role of chazzan at each service.

"We try to get involvement of the people. There's a lot of singing. The point is to have a more haimish experience and as deep an experience as possible," said Rabbi Tanenbaum. Instead of a formal sermon, he often leads a discussion or offers brief explanations of each aliyah.

Rabbi Tanenbaum sees the synagogue as sort of a "department store" of Judaism, offering a variety of boutique-like choices.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

"Some walk into the main sanctuary with a sense of awe and grandeur and it's very inspiring. Others find it cavernous and feel alone," he said.

"No question there's a trend that people want different options," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. The change dates back at least 25 years to the days of nascent chavurot or fellowship groups, he explained.

"A large synagogue is blessed with the ability to respond to various spiritual yearnings. Now it's very hard to find a large synagogue in the United States that doesn't have alternate services."

Probably Toronto's best-known alternate service is at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, which is Orthodox, although the proliferation of smaller independent congregations, such as the Cedarvale Minyan and the egalitarian Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, provides more apparent evidence of the trend.

Silver and her husband Shoel, a lifetime member, have no desire to leave Beth Tzedec for a smaller congregation. "I think the shul has a lot to offer," she said. "There are so many resources we can draw upon. I think the bar mitzvah program is phenomenal. We enjoy the Friday night service very much, and if I can participate in a small service at the shul, I think I have the best of both worlds."

VOLUME 2, NUMBER 1 MARCH, 1997

AshkeNEWS

If you haven't already heard the first ASHKENAZ Festival, held in 1995, was wonderful! A m'khaya, a week of unusual sights and sounds, of world-class artists presenting inspiring and challenging work. It was a time for dancing in the street – a surprisingly ecstatic communal celebration!!

ASHKENAZ will once again feature hundreds of artists from North America, Europe and the Middle East: incredible music (from klezmer to Gypsy to jazz), ground-breaking theatre ensembles, exhilarating modern dance groups, films and their makers, poets, authors, storytellers, a wide range of children's performers as well as workshops, crafts, lectures and demonstrations. The festival roster will read like a who's who of the most exciting artists working in the field of new Yiddish culture. And many of the artists at ASHKENAZ '97 will be appearing in Toronto and Canada for the first time.

Some highlights

The musical centrepiece of the festival will be The ASHKENAZ Orchestra Project, a 22-piece ensemble of some of the finest players on the international scene brought together for the first time to perform a program of new works especially commissioned for debut at ASHKENAZ.

We will have a greatly expanded exhibition of visual arts. Dancing with the Leviathan will present the work of 45 visual artists from across Canada and the U.S. in exhibitions at Harbourfront's York Quay Gallery and at the Lonsdale Gallery in Forest Hill.

The ASHKENAZ Parade will pick up where it left off two years ago with thousands of happy paraders, in and out of costume (hopefully including you!), wielding banners and huge puppets dancing their way along the parade route accompanied by live klezmer bands. Once again Parade preparations will be a community event with all welcome to participate.

Join us for ASHKENAZ this August and experience for yourself the future of Yiddish culture.

Volunteers make ASHKENAZ happen

I first became involved with ASHKENAZ before the 1995 Festival at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre when I painted my vision of a shtetl on a Shabbat night with candles in every window!

In being part of ASHKENAZ I found a place to do something meaningful and Jewish in the company of others. It gave me a place to say how I loved and honoured where my grandparents 'come from' – geographically, spiritually, emotionally and culturally. I took in their language, their prayer and their music; what and who they yearned for back in Poland; their understanding of poverty, the loss of family and the building of a new life. Somehow, being involved in ASHKENAZ from the t-shirt selling to the sewing-machine-shaped-hat-making, helped me express some of this – not only participate as a member of the audience (which in itself is very powerful).

For this year there are many opportunities to volunteer at every skill level and age group, both before and during ASHKENAZ. You can help with administrative tasks, fundraising, site decoration, parade props, marching in the parade, ushering, errand-running and lots more! You can help at our offices, at workshops at your organization or at the Jewish Community Centres. Please fax or mail us the form attached to let us know how you can help make Ashkenaz happen. Events, events

While our thoughts at this time of year look ahead to the warmth of summer and the promise of excitement at the ASHKENAZ '97 Festival, our fundraising committees are keeping warm by being very active.

"Everything You Wanted To Know About Art But Were Afraid to Ask." April 10, 1997 at 7 p.m. at the Lonsdale Gallery, Forest Hill. Come view the work of artist Katja Jacobs and sculpturer George Boileau. Learn about collecting, valuing and "Starting an Art Collection". We will have refreshments and musical entertainment. Bring your (smaller) collectibles and have them identified and appraised by Brian Musselwhite and Conrad Biernacki. Space is limited so book early. Tickets are $36: call Marla at 416-703-6892.

The Ashkenaz Gala – Monday June 23, 1997 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts – a taste of what is to come at the Festival in August. This magical evening will be full of surprises, a high energy show of world-class klezmer music, dance, theatre and much more. The excitement continues with a post-show reception full of Yiddish food and spirit. Gala tickets are $100 – call Judy at 416-782-9033. Tax receipts will be issued.

SPONSORS – WE NEED SPONSORS for our Lonsdale Gallery event, the ASHKENAZ Gala and all of the Festival events. There are many different sponsorship packages available, offering a charitable tax receipt in addition to wonderful recognition opportunities. With an audience of 50,000+ people, this is a great way to promote your business!

The ASHKENAZ '97 Ad Sales Committee is selling ads for the Festival's Program Book (circ. 50,000). A terrific return on your investment and you help a great cause. Quarter page ads start at $250 and full page ads are $750.

For more information on any of these items or to make a donation please call our Fundraising Director Judy Litwack-Goldman at 416-782-9033. Committee Chairs: Corporate Campaign: Rosalie Sharp & Hinda Silber; Gala: Linda Frum, Heather Hoffman & Joel Weinberg; Ad Sales: Merle Levine & Chad Wolfond; Gallery Event: Hindy Friedman.

Har Zion celebrates sponsorship success

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A get-together at Temple Har Zion last week marked the end of the synagogue's sponsorship of a young Bosnian couple, Dayan and Amineta Lukac.

But "it was not a good-bye party," synagogue social action committee chair Arieh Cohen told The CJN. "We plan to stay in touch with them. They have become like relatives — like third cousins. We invite them to birthday parties, Pesach, and things like that."

The story began when Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) spoke to The Toronto Board of Rabbis about the need to help families from the former Yugoslavia.

"Rabbi Michael Stroh (spiritual leader of Temple Har Zion) brought that message to our social action committee," said Cohen.

Meanwhile, the Lukacs, who had asked for help to come to Canada in vain, finally approached the Jewish community in Sarajevo, and the match was made.

(Amineta, now 21, is Muslim, and Dayan, now 26, is the son of a Jewish father and a Catholic mother.)

Cohen explained that the federal government paid for their air fare to Canada, with the understanding that they would pay it back when they got jobs, as well as one quarter of the cost of sponsorship for a year. The synagogue was responsible for the other three-quarters, which came to between $14,000 and $15,000.

Five sponsors came forward with the money, Cohen said. As well, synagogue members found them an apartment, and helped them furnish it, and, after the Lukacs attended school to learn English, helped them find jobs.

Amineta is now working as an assistant physiotherapist in a home for senior citizens, and Dayan, an animation computer expert, is being trained (and paid) by a company which has promised to hire him.

Cohen said the Lukacs have passed the English test necessary to attend university and plan to continue their studies to get Canadian university degrees.

"They are a hard-working couple," Cohen said, "and we have encouraged them to persevere."

David and Margaret Helfgott at a family reunion in Perth, Australia in 1996.

Shine said inaccurate

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The portrayal in the movie Shine of her late father as a brutal man who drove his prodigy pianist son to madness is totally false, Margaret Helfgott, 51, said in a telephone interview from her home in Beersheva, Israel. She has lived in Israel for 20 years.

The film is about Helfgott's brother, David, 49, an Australian concert pianist now on a tour that will bring him to Canada. It deals with his recovery from severe mental illness.

"My father was a very caring man and the film is false in saying that he beat my brother, David, and that he abandoned him when David became mentally ill," she said. "He looked after him at great cost to himself when David came back ill from England."

In fact, her father, Peter, was not a Holocaust survivor as the film implied, and she resents very much the inference that brutality and violence go along with surviving the Holocaust.

"This issue is very important for the Jewish people," she said. "I have met many Holocaust survivors and not one of them has ever driven a family member to illness."

Though her father left the small village of Kamyk, Poland, long before the Holocaust, he did try to bring a younger brother to Australia when he learned what was happening to Jews under the Nazis, Helfgott said.

"Unfortunately, instead of a brother, the family sent a sister who was mentally ill, and my father's plan to make enough money with his brother to rescue the rest of the family went for naught. He lost his father and his brothers and sisters in the Holocaust."

An adventurous type, Peter Helfgott left Poland at an early age and spent a year or two in Palestine in 1925-26, part of it as an acrobat with a travelling circus, before settling in Australia in 1933, where he met his wife in Melbourne. David's wife, now 76, is living a quiet life in Australia.

Helfgott said she is considering suing the film's producers for painting a false picture of her father, "but I am told you cannot defame a dead man, that you can't do anything. But I am trying to find a way."

She saw Shine in London in June of last year, in company with the director, Scott Hicks.

"I told him immediately about my feelings and he said the part about my father beating David was just symbolic and not to worry about it," she said.

Hicks has not replied to her complaints and she has no idea whether the producers plan to remove the stain on her father's reputation.

She said she was not shown the script in advance and although it was shown to her brother and two sisters, they were given only a short time to review the 111 pages in the same room as the director, and were not told about the portrayal of their father.

Her brother, Leslie, 45, is also trying to correct her father's image, while her two sisters, Susie, 43, and Louise, 37, also feel bitter about the movie, she said. They all live in Australia.

Helfgott is also concerned that the movie leaves the incorrect impression that it is other members of the family who are responsible for mental illness, and in this she is supported by leading medical authorities.

In its Jan. 11, 1997 issue, the British Medical Journal states that one of the errors in Shine — common to films about mental illness — is that "mental illness must have both a meaning and a cause."

It goes on: "In Shine, the roots of David's breakdown are laid firmly at the door of his father...One of the pivotal scenes of the film is the father's apparently callous refusal to allow his son to study in America. Yet, when David defies his father to go to England the result is indeed disaster and breakdown. Perhaps Helfgott senior's advice was based on a realistic assessment of the risk to his son's mental health from prolonged separation."

Nazi cases reassigned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe has been replaced as lead counsel on two of the four war crimes cases he was assigned.

Amerasinghe will relinquish the cases involving Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass but will continue as lead counsel in the Helmut Oberlander and Wasily Bogutin cases, said Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

The move came as the Justice Department added more counsel to handle the 10 denaturalization/deportation cases currently under way, Vickery said. A further two war crimes suspects are expected to be named by the end of the month.

Vickery and John Sims, assistant deputy attorney general, said the moves in no way reflect on Amerasinghe. "As we see the pace of litigation speeding up, we've added more and more counsel," Sims said. "We've been responding flexibly as the pace of litigation increases."

There are currently seven teams handling war crimes cases — eight if the one involved in the Antanas Kenstavicius case is included, Sims said. That deportation proceeding came to an end when Kenstavicius, who lived in Hope, B.C., died on the first day of hearings.

Sims said he expects between four and seven of the cases will go before the courts this year. The first of the alleged Nazi war criminals to face trial will be Bogutin, whose hearing is set to begin in Toronto on May 12. The hearing will then be adjourned as a commission travels to Europe to interview witnesses.

Next up will be the case involving Ladislav Csizsik-Csatary, which will begin on July 28 with the gathering of commission evidence in Europe. The trial is scheduled to begin in Montreal on Sept. 29, Vickery said.

Donald MacIntosh and Bonnie Boucher, Justice Department counsel involved in the Konrads Kalejs case (summation arguments ended last week, a decision is pending), have been assigned further cases. MacIntosh will take over the Dueck case from Amerasinghe, while Boucher will handle the case involving Serge Kisluk. Peter Vita, general counsel at the Justice Department's Toronto regional office, will work on the Tobiass case and Roslyn Levine, also of the Toronto regional office, will head the prosecution in the Peteris Vitols case.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber said the organization was pleased about the reassignments. "We certainly urged the Justice Department to seriously consider having the cases spread out over more lawyers," he said. "It's a step in the right direction."

Weill installed in Bonds post

TORONTO — At a recent board meeting of State of Israel Bonds, Women's Division, Dodi Weill was installed as North American vice-chair-Canada by Vicki Erlbaum, State of Israel Bonds North American Women's Division chair.

Weill will serve as the link between the Women's Divisions across Canada and will represent Canadian interests on the North American Women's Division board.

She has just completed a two-year term as Toronto Women's Division chair and will continue to serve on this executive and board.

She says her goal is to encourage women to use State of Israel Bonds for their investment portfolio and to educate women to take more responsibility for their own personal finances. In addition, Weill encourages people to perform a double mitzvah by using State of Israel Bonds to pay off their pledges to other organizations.

After Weill was installed, she passed her gavel to Renee Bernbaum, who will chair the Toronto Women's Division for 1997-1999.

Bernbaum is a graduate of the University of Toronto and received her bachelor of science degree in physiotherapy in 1977. Her accomplishments include eight years treating and rehabilitating amputee patients at West Park Hospital in Toronto. Other activities included research, university, conference and seminar lecturing.

Court criticizes consultant

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto judge has slammed former Metro Toronto Police Services Board member Arnold Minors for teaching a group of Ontario Crown attorneys that the Holocaust was not a racist act.

"In the evidence before me, Minors denied teaching the Holocaust was not a racist act, but his denial was prolix [longwinded], circular and vague. I simply do not accept his evidence in this regard," stated the decision of Ontario Court Judge N.D. McRae.

McRae delivered the judgment while dismissing Minors' defamation suit against the Toronto Sun. Minors sued the Sun, which carried a series of articles and commentaries about his controversial October 1994 seminars on racism and about his description of Toronto police as an occupying army.

Minors had been retained by the provincial government to deliver specialized anti-racism training programs, but when he said the Holocaust, though horrible, was not an example of racism, he was confronted immediately by irate Crown attorneys. Five government lawyers testified as to Minors' statements to them.

"Teaching that the Holocaust, while a form of discrimination, along with homophobia or sexism, was not racist, was revising the Holocaust," McRae stated. "It diminishes the horror of the Holocaust in which six million people were murdered by the Nazis solely because of race."

The judgment was applauded by Ellen Cole, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' community relations committee. "What we found to be encouraging was a judge having a full and sensitive understanding about the issues surrounding the Holocaust and how it should be presented," she said.

Hispanic publisher a success

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eduardo Uruena's biography doesn't quite read as one of those rags to riches stories, but it comes awfully close.

When he arrived in Canada 27 years ago from Bogota, Colombia, Uruena had $300 in his pocket and a burning desire to make a new life for himself in the land of opportunity.

Today, he's owner, publisher and director of El Popular, a Spanish language daily newspaper that serves the country's growing Hispanic population.

The tabloid-size paper offers local community news, reports on developments in the Spanish-speaking world, presents lots of sports and runs feature stories geared at helping readers acclimatize to Canadian society, Uruena says.

"We try to be honest on a daily basis, act with a sense of balance and try to present to the readers the best we can without being biased," he said.

Speaking in the paper's modest offices in the Junction neighborhood of Toronto, Uruena said El Popular plays an important role in the lives of recent and even more established immigrants. The paper exposes instances of discrimination and it focuses on issues of social adjustment to Canadian society.

As publisher of a high profile paper, Uruena, 45, is constantly in demand at community events. Despite those seemingly never-ending commitments, he tries not to let them interfere with his family life. He cherishes Shabbat at home with his family, worshipping at the Minyan Sepharad and developing his Jewish roots.

In Toronto, Uruena is free to pray and believe according to his own conscience. He revels in that freedom and contrasts it to his youth in Colombia.

It wasn't always so easy for him to openly identify with Judaism. "We faced a lot of bigotry" in Bogota growing up, he says.

The descendant of a family of conversos (Jews forced by the church to adopt Roman Catholicism), Uruena says his family secretly maintained Jewish practices, like lighting Shabbat candles, "a certain way of cooking, little things that we kept secret."

As a youth, Uruena had to attend Catholic school (there were no others) and "live by their rules. That had a lot of impact on [Jewish] people and their faith was lost," he says.

"The Jews were seen as evil by everybody so in order for people to [exist], we had to be one of them."

Despite that recipe for coping with an unsympathetic majority culture, Uruena was a rebel in his teen years. He constantly challenged the Catholic dogma he was taught and was even expelled from one school.

Eduardo Uruena

After curbing his tongue, he managed to graduate from another school and afterwards, got a job with a local newspaper reporting results from the racetrack. He made a name for himself when he broke a story about fraud at the track and was made a full-time reporter.

Meanwhile, he and his brother Carlos began considering new opportunities outside of Colombia. They originally contemplated moving to Hamburg, but Carlos moved instead to Toronto and reported back on the opportunities here.

Eduardo obtained a temporary visa and joined him in the late '70s. His $300 lasted three months. After that he subsisted on a diet of apples and cheese that Carlos brought home every night from his job as a busboy at the King Edward Hotel.

When Eduardo went to Immigration authorities to seek a working visa, he was told he would be issued one if he could converse in English with the Immigration officer at the next interview.

For two months, Uruena studied English night and day and when he returned he had mastered the language enough to receive the coveted visa.

From the Immigration office, Uruena went directly to the King Eddie where he was put to work in the hotel's laundry.

From the laundry room, Uruena worked his way up to valet and eventually, despite some opposition from a closed-minded manager, to a front-desk position.

After three years at the King Eddie and another two at the Holiday Inn, Uruena switched to the insurance business and began writing a column on savings plans and RRSPs for El Popular.

"When the opportunity arose to buy the paper, I jumped at it," he said.

In those day in the late '70s, the paper was published twice a week. Today, it's published every day but Sunday and its circulation averages 8,000 a day, with 11,500 papers sold on Friday. The tabloid has 18 people on the payroll, including four reporters (full-time and freelance), editors, production staff and office staff. There's also a Montreal office with four staff people.

During the slower, winter season, the daily papers average 20 pages and 36 on Friday. The rest of the year, the daily numbers move up to 28 pages and, in a good week, 44 on Friday.

El Popular is distributed in supermarkets, variety stores and other establishments frequented by Toronto's Hispanic community. It's also available in most major Canadian centres, including Vancouver, Ottawa, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Calgary and Halifax.

With 250,000 Latin Americans in the greater Toronto area alone, plus a few thousand more Spaniards and natives of Spanish Morocco, there is ample room for the paper's circulation to grow, Uruena believes.

The readers share an almost insatiable desire to read about their old homelands so each issue features reports from most of Latin America through news agencies such as Agence France Press, Reuters, United Media and United Features Syndicate. The paper also offers general international news, Uruena says.

Sports, particularly "futbol," is another popular item. In fact, "if we don't have sports news, the phone doesn't stop ringing," Uruena says.

Though El Popular is a going concern with a real presence in the community, Uruena admits to some tough times in the past. During the recession in the early 1980s, "I was worried whether I'd have enough money to pay the printer." Similarly, times were tough during the recent recession, he says.

Despite those trying times, Uruena is thriving in Canada. He's engaged to be married to Chantal Nantel, whose mother, who is Jewish, is from Peru. And unlike the situation in Colombia, where for four generations his family lived as secret Jews, in Canada Uruena identifies with his Jewish heritage openly. His office is adorned with mezuzahs and "in Canada, my Jewish identity increased very much," he says. "I find myself close to my roots, close to our traditions."

Although he doesn't attempt to force-feed his readers a diet of Israeli or Jewish news, the paper attempts to report objectively about Israel. And when the Jewish festivals roll around, there's a good chance El Popular will run a story about the holiday and its significance.

Unlike his experience in Colombia, Uruena's Jewish heritage hasn't effected his relationship with the Hispanic community.

"I am who I am. If people don't accept that, that's their problem," he says.

We wish to extend our deepest appreciation to our family and friends for your kind expressions of sympathy during the bereavement of our dear wife, mother, sister, grandmother and great-grandmother

INTERESTED IN HIKING IN ISRAEL THIS MAY?

A CHARITY

BIKING/HIKING EXPEDITION TO ISRAEL

MAY 21-30, 1997

OPD MISSION with a DIFFERENCE 97

Join a group of hikers & cyclists for a unique and rewarding fundraising Mission to Israel. Hike along beautiful and challenging routes through historical and biblical sites such as Rosh Haayin, the source of the Yarkon River, Tel Aphek where the Philistines pitched for battle against B'nai Yisrael and the old Crusader fortress of Migdal Zedek.

We look after everything - travel, accommodations, equipment and guides. Land costs are $1,495 per person. Airfare is extra. For the challenge of completing the journey, you will be asked to raise a minimum of $1,500 in sponsored donations for the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Time is running out for you to be treated to an adventure destined to leave you with new friends, great memories, and a tremendous sense of accomplishment.

TO LEARN MORE —
Please contact Merle Goldman, executive director, Ontario Region, (416) 485-8000 or 1-888-HebrewU, or by fax (416) 485-8565, or Jerry Ziedenberg, mission chairman, (416) 979-1308.

Memorial in Moncton shul honors Jewish war veterans

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — It took Maurice Jakes 50 years but his dream of honoring Jewish war veterans from Atlantic Canada has finally come true.

After years of research, letter writing, and single-handed fundraising, he has succeeded in erecting a memorial to Jewish war veterans in Moncton's Tiferes Israel Synagogue.

The memorial of 384 name plaques identifies individually, and by their home community, the veterans who fought for Canada in World Wars I and II.

"I've been trying to do this since the end of World War II," Jakes said from his Moncton home. "We kicked the idea around for a long time. Each time I'd meet war veterans in Maritime communities, I'd talk about a memorial and people were interested but no one was doing anything. Finally, I told people in Moncton, who had previously expressed no interest, that people in the region wanted it, and they said, go ahead."

Based in Moncton, Jakes, 83, was a garment and souvenir salesman until he retired about a decade ago. He served as an RCAF tail gunner with bomber command, enlisting in 1940, surviving many missions over Germany and returning home in 1944. He was one of 12 Moncton Jews who served in the war, drawn from the 24 families who had settled in the city after emigrating from Russia in the early 20th century.

"Even before I got permission from the synagogue to put up the plaque in the lobby, I was getting donations from veterans or their families in Alaska, Florida, Chicago and across Canada after an article appeared in Shalom Magazine (the Atlantic Jewish Council's quarterly publication)."

The total project cost close to $5,000, Jakes said, "with Moncton's vets probably paying 90 percent of it. I know there was a lot of expense from my pocket."

The top of the memorial contains a special section honoring eight Maritimers who served with extra distinction. Named are: Wing Commander Maurice Lipton, Sydney, Air Force Cross; Aaron Gluestein, New Waterford, N.S., Distinguished Flying Cross; Lt. Col. Joseph Tanzman, Saint John, N.B., Officer of the Order of the British Empire; Major Max Morris, Sydney, N.S., Member of the Order of the British Empire; Lt. Samuel Brody, Plaster Rock, N.B., Bronze Cross, Netherlands; Sgt. Leo Lighter, Glace Bay, N.S. and Pvt. Maurice Bernstein, Halifax, mentioned in dispatches; and Issie Gold, Glace Bay, a major in the U.S. Army.

London JNF dinner set

LONDON, Ont. — This city's Jewish community will gather at Or Shalom Synagogue for the eighth annual Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner on June 15. Guests of honor are Cantor Josef Freiman and his wife Eva.

Freiman has been with Or Shalom Synagogue for more than 28 years and has trained hundreds of bar/bat mitzvah students. Most bnei/bnot mitzvah took place at Or Shalom or Beth Tefilah, in London, yet there was even one in Johannesburg, South Africa.

Dinner chair is William Klein, president of Or Shalom, who chaired the 1996 Negev Dinner's "Tribute to Survival," honoring Holocaust survivors who live in London.

Proceeds from this year's dinner will go towards Action Plan Negev, a new project of JNF.

Yossi, as Cantor Freiman is called, has touched the lives of countless families, many who still live in London. However, there are many now living in other parts of Canada, the United States and Israel, who have also had a connection with him, whether through a bar/bat mitzvah or marriage. A search team would like to hear from them.

Further information is available through the London JNF Office: at 519-432-2139; fax: 519-439-2994.

E-mail addresses are: [ZevKlein@aol.com]; [jkjm.dubitsky@sympatico.ca]; [btepper@physiology.uwo.ca].

MONTREAL — The recent stories about the gold reserves deposited by the Nazis in Swiss banks during World War II have generated a new wave of anti-Semitism, said the president of the Federation of Jewish Communities of Switzerland.

"This controversy revived an anti-Semitism that has been latent until now. The new surge of anti-Semitism has taken the form of abusive statements and offensive attacks on our community," Rolf Bloch said in an interview when he was in Montreal recently.

The renewal of anti-Semitism, he stressed however, is not a great threat to Swiss Judaism. "The government, churches, community associations, as well as many of our fellow citizens have vigorously condemned the anti-Semitic statements... The Jewish community of Switzerland deplores the bitter form that this affair has taken in the last few months," he said.

The Swiss federation includes some 20 Jewish communities and there are about 18,000 Jews currently living in Switzerland. Since the issue began, Bloch said, the federation has been one of the principal spokespersons with the Swiss banks.

Disclosure

"From the beginning, we have been at one with the Jews who called for full disclosure of the accounts of Holocaust victims being held by the Swiss. Our federation took the first steps with the banks involved," Bloch said.

Asked why, since the early '50s, Swiss bankers have rejected the claims of descendants of the Nazis' victims, Bloch said, "The banks showed a disturbing lack of sensitivity to the dramatic situation faced by the heirs of Holocaust survivors. By acting with such apathy and indifference, the banks gave the impression that they had something to hide."

According to Bloch, who runs the chocolaterie founded by his family, two huge errors were made by the Swiss banking authorities. The complainants were received by the banks' legal departments, who are always very precise, rather than by the customer service departments who might perhaps have better understood, he said. And they required proof, rather than accepting corroborating evidence, as is being done now.

CJC said one objective of the meeting was to ensure that claims from Canada do not face undue delays. Dayer said he would relay the request to Switzerland that claims from Canada be handled quickly and efficiently.

CJC added that it is aligning itself with the World Jewish Congress to accelerate the pace of claims' settlements.

Farber said Congress has offered its expertise to the Swiss in combatting anti-Semitism and toughening laws on hate crimes.

Dayer said he does not think there is overt anti-Semitism in Switzerland, but that the whole banking debacle has caused his country "to open our eyes and face our past and history."

The ambassador also assured CJC that from now on, no claimants will be asked to produce death certificates for relatives who were murdered in Nazi death camps.

The Swiss have shown "a new sensitivity" on the matter of death certificates, Farber said.

Dayer said his government has shown "determination to thoroughly and quickly" deal with the banking scandal.

The next two weeks will be a period of intense activity, CJC said. Its next meeting with Dayer is scheduled for the end of March.

"This was the beginning of an important dialogue on an issue that needs urgent resolution," Hershon remarked. "We look forward to ongoing discussions with Ambassador Dayer to help expedite justice in the long-overdue settling of these accounts."

AJC provides teens' programs

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Yakov Feig spends an hour talking about programming for Jewish youngsters, teens, university students and young adults in the Atlantic Region of Canada.

This is the only hour on this day in which he'll sit still. He's a whirling dervish of activity during the day, and probably wakes up calling out ideas in the middle of most nights.

Feig has been programmer for the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) since June 1995. A one-year contract was renewed and will be renewed again and again, as long as he wants to stay in the region to bring Jewish education and culture to people actively seeking it.

"My goal is to create a spark," he says, sitting in his small Halifax office, crowded with books and brochures, calendars and files — the tools of a man busy travelling to outer reaches of a region while also bringing the message of Judaism to metropolitan areas. "But I can't replace a good education system or good parenting. The community and family must keep the fire going."

Feig works with several groups — youngsters to age 12, teens in junior high and high school, university students, young adults from 23 to 39 years of age, people planning Israel programs, and non-Jews seeking information.

Feig spends a weekend a month in the small communities of the region, most times meeting with youth, teens and adults in separate programs.

He says he's starting to work with Canadian Young Judaea, which will bring a shaliach to the small community once every eight weeks. That will almost double the attention in the region.

The university programs have brought most satisfaction to Feig. He estimates there are 375 Jewish students in the region, with 200 in Halifax. "Our list of identified Jewish students is 211 from across the region with 135 in Halifax. The 211 is 71 more than two years ago when I arrived, so we're having more active participation. For social events in the city, we'll draw more than 50 percent and for cultural events close to 25 percent."

He says there are active student groups at Acadia, University of New Brunswick and Memorial University of Newfoundland as well as at Dalhousie and Saint Mary's in Halifax.

The young adult group is new this year, with organized activities every four to six weeks. There are 67 registered, mostly from the Halifax area. "These are our future community leaders. That's important for the Atlantic Jewish Council because the leaders have been there for a long time and are seeking people to move up to replace them. We're trying to get the young adults involved in committees, campaigns and whatever their interest."

He emphasizes it's important for these young people, and university students, to remain in the region. "The only way is if they realize Atlantic Canada is viable for them socially and economically. In many cases they're not synagogue-connected, so they are getting a Jewish connection through our programming."

CJC, Rambam to meet with MPs

OTTAWA — Ten years ago this month, the federal government released the Report of the Deschenes Commission of Inquiry into War Criminals in Canada, the fulfilment of then prime minister Brian Mulroney's stated commitment to deal at last with this issue.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), led by its war crimes committee chair Prof. Irving Abella, will mark this occasion on March 19, with a day of activities in Ottawa.

American private investigator Steven Rambam, who in recent months has gained an international reputation in tracking down suspected Nazi war criminals, will join other CJC officials in meetings with media.

Tenth anniversary of Deschenes Commission

At noon, he will meet members of Parliament during a luncheon in the Railway Room. The event is being sponsored by Liberal MP Dan McTeague.

At 7:30 p.m., together with the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council and Beth Shalom Synagogue, CJC has arranged for a community-wide program featuring Rambam and Abella.

Viewers of the CBS program 60 Minutes will have seen Rambam and Abella on a recent segment with Mike Wallace, examining the issue of Canada as a haven for Nazi war criminals. Rambam came to Canada armed with a list of suspects, phony academic credentials and a sense of urgency to "out" these individuals, some of whom allegedly participated in a variety of heinous actions during World War II.

He found several names on his list merely by consulting phone books, since it is now clear that many of these people came to Canada under their real names and have remained untouched for 50 years.

Rambam captured some of their confessions using a hidden microphone.

The RCMP is now examining the first batch of Rambam's tapes and had planned to use the confession to complement its case against one suspect living in Hope, British Columbia. This person died, however, as pre-trial hearings were getting underway.

But this, of course, points to the very real problem facing Canadian authorities in dealing with Nazi war criminals so long after the war: alleged perpetrators and witnesses are dying, memories are dimming and time is running short.

Tilly Shames at Tu b'Shvat seder.

Campus program links Judaism to environment

By TILLY SHAMES

Last year, I attended my first York University Jewish Student Federation (JSF) program, the Tu b'Shvat seder.

I had just come back from a trip to Israel I had found inspiring; a friend of mine was planning the evening; I was looking for some Jewish identification; and it was an environmental program. I couldn't think of any excuse not to take part, even though the fact that JSF was involved had been excuse enough for me for three years.

Now I am glad I took part. It was my first introduction to some of the most dynamic people I have ever met and the most interesting and relevant aspects of Judaism for me.

A Tu b'Shvat seder, a couple of leadership days, a trip to the middle of the Arizona desert for an Eco-Zionism conference, and the next thing I know, I'm a Jewish leader on campus. Who'd have thought it?

As I try to think how to put on paper all the wonderful thoughts to describe my feelings about Judaism, nature and Israel together, I can hear Noa singing about universe, beginning with u-n-i (you 'n I). Throughout my years in environmental studies, we were always taught to "Think globally, act locally." But how much of a difference can you make if you just focus on your community, you and I, and forget about the rest? Lots!

The environmental committee of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, JNF on Campus, has spent the year providing programs to raise environmental awareness and get people outdoors to appreciate the beauty of nature. For most of us, it is the first time we are making connections between Judaism and nature. All of us are learning from each other as we share our own insights and ideas. But more importantly, we are sharing our excitement and energy about Judaism and the environment with others who will hopefully gain from this experience.

The season came full circle this year at Tu b'Shvat. In my friend's cozy basement, listening to the beautiful words of Rabbi Michael Skobac and the others at the table feasting on fruits and nuts and celebrating the new year of the trees, I could not help but feel satisfied by what we had accomplished during the year. At the end of the evening, we felt empowered and energized, the other seder organizers and I, and we stayed there together, too tired to go home and too connected to the program to leave it just yet.

I think that closure of the evening and the four seasons that had passed since my first JSF program came when we had packed up the chairs and tables, recycled the glass and paper, composted the shells and peels, given away all the mugs and stickers, and were left with just a tiny plastic bag of garbage from 35 people.

If we could feel good about anything, it was that the evening produced energy, warmth and awareness, and not garbage. A little group can make a difference and what we do with this universe does depend on the actions of you 'n I.

Shortage of chronic care beds a concern to community

brought swift reaction. "We have had patients in tears here within a few hours. We anticipate a tremendous number of Branson patients will be looking to us for acute hospital care," said Mackenzie of North York General.

The shortage of chronic care beds is also of vital concern to the Jewish community.

Runnymede Hospital is one of the 10 to be closed.

A waiting list of 4,500 for Metro nursing homes is growing at the rate of 150 seniors a month, and more and more require heavy care, such as lifting, bathing, dressing and intravenous feeding.

Said one volunteer at a chronic care hospital: "Have we got to the point where we're acknowledging it costs too much to take care of our severely handicapped and sick people? When you talk about chronic care, somebody's in that bed. And they live there. It's their home."

About 30 per cent of Branson's patient population and the majority of its medical staff are Jewish, said the Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region and UJA Federation, expressing "extreme concern" over Branson's closing.

"Many of the community's most vulnerable members will have to travel further for emergency medical attention," warned Alan Sandler, vice-president of Community Planning and Allocations for UJA Federation.

"Branson is the only hospital in the area that operates a Sabbath elevator and has a separate Jewish chapel on its premises," said Harold Brief, Ontario region vice-chair.

UJA Federation and Congress were part of a coalition of ethnocultural and faith communities that wrote a position paper last year urging the Ontario government to respect institutions serving specific ethnocultural institutions.

"We have been stonewalled by the government at this point and if this continues, we may have to redefine how we proceed," Brief told an Ontario region executive meeting March 6.

"This is a very dangerous step," Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Synagogue told the executive.

"If a heart patient needs another 20 minutes to get to a hospital it could be too late."

He asked Congress officers to make another appeal for at least a heart unit at Branson. Brief replied that Congress would support whatever action Branson wants to take.

Palestinians reject planned pullback

'No reason to paint everything in rosy colors': Levy

By JON IMMANUEL and DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian representatives rejected the scope of the planned Israeli redeployment in the West Bank in a recent meeting held in Jerusalem between Foreign Minister David Levy and Palestinian Authority (PA) secretary-general Mahmoud Abbas that ended in an atmosphere of crisis.

Apart from rejecting the extent of the redeployment, the Palestinians claimed they should have been consulted before the decision was made.

The meeting was dominated by Palestinian concern over recent Israeli actions and growing calls to suspend talks until the actions are reversed.

Levy replied to Abbas' protest by saying the Palestinians should "lower [their] expectations." The disagreements during the meeting were about Har Choma, the extent of last week's nine percent pullback decision and the closing of four Palestinian offices in Jerusalem.

"There is no reason to paint everything in rosy colors," Levy told reporters after the session at a Jerusalem hotel. He said the sides have different positions "based upon different interpretations" put forward by their respective legal advisers. Foreign ministry spokesperson Aviv Shiran characterized the meeting as "not easy."

Immediately after the meeting, the Palestinian representatives left for Gaza to report to PA Chairman Yasser Arafat, who had returned from a visit to Jordan and called the latest Israeli moves "conspiracies and tricks."

Meeting leaves tension in air

Meanwhile, the prime minister's spokesperson, Shai Bazak, denied remarks by Likud MKs who said that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had promised work would start at Har Choma next week.

"He said he deliberately did not want to name a date, except to say that it will start soon," said Bazak.

When Abbas asked for Israel to reconsider the construction on Har Choma, Levy rejected this. He noted Israel's position remains that there is nothing in the Oslo Accords which forbids Israeli construction anywhere during the interim period, let alone in Jerusalem.

Regarding the scope of the nine percent pullback, Abbas complained the figure is way too low. Here again, Levy pointed out that the scope of the different pullbacks is to be decided by Israel alone and is not a subject of negotiation with the Palestinians. The foreign minister cited a January letter from then secretary of state Warren Christopher to back up the point.

A third difference between the two sides related to Israel's closing of four Palestinian offices in eastern Jerusalem. While the Palestinians acknowledge that they are not permitted by Oslo to have PA offices in the city, they deny that these four offices are PA offices. U.S. officials have questioned whether the fact the PA funds the four offices makes them official, or whether this is the kind of grant money that Israeli non-profit bodies receive as well.

The two sides did agree that talks on the final disposition of the territories would resume, as scheduled, on March 17.

In Gaza recently, a meeting of all political groups established a joint PLO-Islamic committee to resist settlement and land expropriation, amid veiled warnings of violence. The meeting was arranged by the PA and the Islamic Committee Against Settlements, one of the four offices ordered closed in Jerusalem.

The delegates at the three-hour meeting decided that a Higher National-Islamic Committee would set up joint subcommittees in all the districts of Gaza and the West Bank. Each subcommittee would include one delegate from each faction. This would establish ongoing anti-Israel cooperation for the first time between Hamas and the PA.

"All means should be considered," PA cabinet secretary Ahmed Abdel-Rahman told the meeting. "All Palestinians should be invited to confront settlements. Israel is not dealing with us as normal people. Israel is humiliating our people and we must reassess a peace process in which Israel thinks it is above the law."

He demanded that the United States treat Israel the way it used to treat South Africa and Yugoslavia. "If Israel is wrong, sanctions should be imposed. We want America to stand with us to push forward the peace process."

Pope John Paul II also criticized Israeli actions in Jerusalem, calling them "grave" and implying that Israel would share responsibility for the consequences.

A Saudi-owned newspaper, Al-Hayat, urged Arab countries to boycott American products.

Iranian leader Ali Khamenei said in a speech televised nationwide that the veto showed America's "global arrogance."

Netanyahu heads to Russia

By STEVE RODAN and JERUSALEM POST STAFF
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is to leave this week for a 48-hour visit to Russia, marking his first trip to the country since taking office.

The visit will also mark the first meeting between Netanyahu and Russian President Boris Yeltsin. Netanyahu will also hold meetings with Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov and Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzyzov.

Both Chernomyrdin and Luzykov are considered potential successors to Yeltsin.

High on Netanyahu's agenda is expected to be the role of Russian technology in Iran's efforts to adapt an SS-4 missile, which has a range to hit Israel.

In a briefing for Russian-speaking journalists, Netanyahu said he expects to raise the problem of Islamic militancy. Representatives from eight Russian immigrant publications are accompanying Netanyahu.

In Moscow, Netanyahu will also pay a visit to the main synagogue, where he will meet members of the Jewish community. Netanyahu plans to visit St. Petersburg and the famed Hermitage Museum before returning home.

Netanyahu expects a warm welcome in Moscow. Domestic troubles notwithstanding, Russian officials say they are excited over the visit and hope the prime minister will agree to a more active Russian role in the Middle East peace process.

"With this government, we have a leadership that recognizes the benefits of Israeli-Russian cooperation in many fields, including the peace process," a senior Russian diplomat said.

Diplomatic sources in Moscow say Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky's visit to Russia in January was a resounding success that clearly paved the way for Netanyahu's trip.

"Sharansky's visit opened a new era," the senior diplomat said. "His visit to his prison was necessary to show that the old Soviet Union and its policies are dead and a new relationship is possible."

Israeli-Russian trade has grown sharply in the last four years, from $44 million (US) in 1992 to $350 million in 1996. Israeli exports last year accounted for $250 million. Currently, Elbit is trying to conclude a $60 million deal to provide medical equipment to Russia.

A more sensitive area for Netanyahu, however, will be deciding whether Israel will pursue a strategic relationship with Moscow. In 1995, the two countries signed a defence memorandum that both Israeli and Russian officials acknowledge has virtually been ignored.

Israel's goal is to promote joint ventures in defence contracts.

Several projects are stuck because Moscow has blocked deals or Israeli participation in contracts for third countries, such as the upgrading of about 3,500 MiG-21 fighters sold by the former Soviet Union around the world.

One source said Yeltsin himself banned defence cooperation with Israel following his meeting with Yitzhak Rabin in September 1995. Yeltsin agreed with Rabin's proposals for defence industry cooperation, but stressed that Moscow sees this as strategic.

As a result, Yeltsin asked that Israel sign a comprehensive agreement on strategic cooperation similar to that signed with the United States. Rabin refused.

But Russian diplomats see Israel's asset as a strategic partner that can influence the United States.

Regarding the expansion of NATO, a U.S. proposal sharply opposed by Moscow, Russian diplomats are urging Israelis to lobby the Clinton administration and Congress against the idea, saying it will increase tensions in the Middle East.

A defence relationship would also include another deal pending: one between Israel and China for the upgrade of the Ilyushin-76 early-warning aircraft. Russia and Israel are partners in the upgrade, but Russian officials are said to be upset that Israel signed a deal with China without Moscow's input.

Russian diplomats say they expect Moscow to agree to release the plane for modernization by Israel. Under the contract, IAI subsidiary Elta Electronics Industries would provide the Phalcon radar and advanced electronic subsystems.

Briev, Moscow, would enlarge the plane to accommodate the Israeli upgrade.

Bar-On probe nears end

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — A number of the central figures in the Bar-On Affair are to be questioned again this week, some of them under caution, as the probe enters what police hope will be its seventh and final week.

Those expected to be questioned include Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi, Prime Minister's Office director-general Avigdor Lieberman, Shas MK Aryeh Deri, Roni Bar-On and Likud activist David Appel.

Police are investigating allegations revealed by Channel 1 television, according to which Shas made a deal to support the Hebron agreement in exchange for Bar-On being appointed attorney general and arranging a plea bargain for Deri, who is on trial for fraud.

A decision is yet to be made whether to requestion Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Education Minister Zevulun Hammer, who has not yet been questioned, may be called to give evidence this week. Hammer abstained in the cabinet vote on the Bar-On appointment.

Police and the State Attorney's Office were reported to be in disagreement over the legal implications of the findings thus far.

The police are reportedly inclined to recommend serving indictments against several personalities in the probe on charges of conspiracy, fraud and breach of trust. However, the State Attorney's Office is taking a more conservative stance and is not yet prepared to recommend indictments.

annual book fair because he was born abroad. The ban drew outraged responses nationwide, and Halter was accompanied by four former culture ministers in a demonstration in Toulon.

"Ever since the FN victory, a terrible atmosphere of mistrust has reigned here," says Martine Namias, a Tunisian-born Jew. She adds that this is a mark of daily life under a totalitarian regime, not that of a Western democracy.

"The day after the election, people started talking to one another in a different way," says Lyonel, 17, who declined to give his last name. "Nobody knew who'd voted for the FN. If somebody you know spoke to you in a strange way, you started wondering whether he had. Very few people would publicly admit that they had voted for the extreme right."

But after the FN won in another municipality — all four towns are in the unemployment-racked southeastern districts of Bouches-du-Rhône and Var — people who had secretly agreed with the FN's anti-foreigner stance came out publicly. Some freely air their bigotry in the presence of Jews and Arabs, the main targets of their hatred. Ethnic slurs and insults are becoming more common in public, Aziza says.

The city council has been more cautious than its counterpart in Marignane, which stopped subsidies on public-school lunches that did not include pork, an obvious attack on Muslims and Jews. The libraries there have also cleared the works of left-wing writers and thinkers from the shelves, replacing them with books by extreme rightists.

However, a few weeks after Le Chevalier's victory in Toulon, a small bookshop hawking wares from the ultra-nationalist publishing house, Les Editions Nationales, opened next door to the opera in the heart of the city's cultural quarter. It bills itself as a "nonconformist" bookstore and sells propaganda tracts, FN publications and even stamps issued during World War II by the collaborationist Vichy government.

On the eve of the June 1995 election, with an FN victory in the offing, the community's leaders broke with standard practice by calling on all Jewish voters to go to the polls; failure to cast ballots, they argued, would only strengthen the Front.

Soon afterwards, the local Jewish leadership announced a boycott of the city council, a tactic adopted by Jewish communities, political movements, artists' groups and intellectuals in other FN-run localities. The community reasoned that rightists in City Hall would use any contacts with Jews to generate propaganda, "in order to show that they treat the Jews well, while we know exactly what their ideas are," explains Aziza.

All contacts were immediately stopped, except for urgent cases, such as when the community needed a licence to enlarge the cemetery.

City Hall is now applying financial and psychological pressure to force the community into ending its boycott.

It is targeting the community's most important material asset, the new Or Nahmani synagogue and cultural centre.

Fifteen years ago, Jewish leaders reached an agreement with the city under which it would evacuate its ancient synagogue in exchange for municipal aid to construct a new one.

The FN-dominated council is ignoring the verbal agreement and has demanded that the community repay the city 550,000 francs ($100,000 US) a year, which is well beyond the community's means. The council, in an official letter, even threatened to sell the synagogue if the community does not pay its debt.

The synagogue has become the council's favorite battlefield against local Jews. One of Le Chevalier's deputy mayors made a surprise safety inspection, for example, and threatened to close the synagogue for minor infractions. The police officer who accompanied him later told Jewish leaders that none of the city's churches would have passed such an inspection.

And for the first time in years, when worshippers arrived for services last Yom Kippur, they found there was no police protection for the synagogue.

The community — which, like those in many French localities, was revived by an influx of North African Jews — is now at a crossroad. Many are thinking of leaving, not only because of the FN, which is expected to strengthen its position in the future, but also because of the deep economic crisis gripping the country.

One of the main destinations is Israel. The trend is nationwide, with aliyah rising over the past five years from 800 annually to 2,200, more than from any other Western country.

However, leaders of the Jewish community's official umbrella organization say there is still time to stop the FN's advance.

The Representative Council of Jewish Institutions in France (CRIF) recently called upon all democratic forces to mobilize against Le Pen and his party. It is not too late for France, they argue.

Har Choma's message: Israel will tighten its grip on Jerusalem

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Benjamin Netanyahu's decision to build Har Choma, a neighborhood in southeastern Jerusalem, puts the Palestinians on notice that Israel intends to proceed with plans to tighten its physical grip on the city.

Mideast Analysis

Over the protests of the Palestine Authority and the Arab world, Israel intends to erect 6,500 apartments in eastern Jerusalem, 2,500 of which are scheduled to be built in the first phase starting soon. Har Choma is expected to accommodate about 30,000 Jews.

According to the Israeli government, 3,000 units will be set aside for Palestinians in 10 Arab neighborhoods in East Jerusalem, annexed by Israel in 1967.

Har Choma, the largest Jewish residential housing project in Israel's capital for more than a decade, is part of a larger scheme to build 28,500 units in Jerusalem: 20,000 for Jews and 8,500 for Arabs, in rough proportion to Jerusalem's current population of 405,000 Jews and 160,000 Arabs (less than 10 percent of whom are citizens of Israel).

Israel portrays Har Choma in benevolent terms, saying it is designed to alleviate a severe housing shortage and to foster "peaceful coexistence" between Jews and Arabs.

But the overriding goal of the plan, as well as Netanyahu's announcement last week that he will close four Palestinian offices in Jerusalem linked with the Palestine Authority, is to consolidate Israel's sovereign hold over East Jerusalem, which is claimed by the Palestinians.

(There is also a fourth factor at work here, domestic politics. After Israel's partial withdrawal from Hebron, Netanyahu felt he had to placate religious and secular nationalists in his camp. Indeed, the National Religious Party and the Third Way threatened to leave the coalition if Netanyahu failed to build in Har Choma).

Since capturing East Jerusalem during the Six Day War, Israel has made no secret of its desire to amalgamate it with West Jerusalem, the seat of its government. The Labor party, now in opposition, laid the groundwork for Israel's expansion in East Jerusalem, and, like the Likud bloc, regards Jerusalem in its entirety as Israel's "eternal and undivided" capital.

In the past 30 years, Israel has expropriated one-third of the land in East Jerusalem, mainly from Palestinians, and filled the void with 38,500 Jewish housing units in strategically-located neighborhoods. By contrast, Israel expropriated the partially wooded 463-acre site in Har Choma primarily from Jews.

Har Choma, the development of which was supported by the late Yitzhak Rabin, is an integral link in a chain of Jewish neighborhoods which ring eastern Jerusalem: Gilo, French Hill, Ramot, Ramat Eshkol and so on. With these new neighborhoods, the demographic balance of power has tilted in Israel's favor. Har Choma is intended not only to maintain that delicate balance, but to seal off southern Jerusalem's Arab population centres from the West Bank.

In an effort to keep the demographic balance intact, a succession of Israeli governments from prime minister Levi Eshkol onward imposed onerous building restrictions on Arabs in East Jerusalem. By one estimate, Israel issued 170 building permits each year to Palestinians, compared to 3,000 for Jews.

Given these figures, and Rabin's broken promise over a decade ago to build housing for East Jerusalem Arabs in Beit Hanina as compensation for the construction of the Pisgat Ze'ev neighborhood, the Palestinians are deeply skeptical of Netanyahu's pledge to provide them with 3,500 building permits.

The Palestinians claim that the unilateral nature of the Har Choma plan violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the Oslo accords because it prejudices final status negotiations set to begin on March 15.

Israel, however, claims that the Oslo agreements only prohibit changes in the political status of disputed jurisdictions like Jerusalem. It is certainly a contentious gray area, one that will cause more tension and, perhaps, further violence in the not-too-distant future.

The Week in Israel

March 3

• Menachem Magidor was recommended to succeed Prof. Hanoch Gutfreund as the next president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Magidor, 51, is a professor of mathematics and the former dean of the Faculty of Science.

March 4

• Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said he was worried that the police were being made scapegoats in the probe of corruption allegations surrounding the government's appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

March 5

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered the closure of four offices in eastern Jerusalem linked to the Palestinian Authority (PA). Palestinian officials were considering petitioning the High Court to set aside the order.

• Eitan Ben-Tsur, director general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, met with PA official Sufian Abu Zaide to discuss ways to bring Israelis and Palestinians closer together. During the meeting they discussed possible joint activities in the areas of education, media and sports.

March 6

• Police were investigating two stabbing attacks on Israelis: in Jerusalem, a 50-year-old man was stabbed near the King David Hotel; near Hebron, a taxi driver was lightly wounded after an argument with his fares.

March 7

• After long, tense discussions that lasted into the early morning hours, the cabinet voted 10-7 to relinquish nine percent of the West Bank, including two percent of Area C, the territory under exclusive Israeli control, to the PA.

Dentist turns disability into an asset

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A dentist's worst nightmare is the possibility of a sudden disability, says Dr. Ian Wexler, 37, who four years ago was faced with the onset of a debilitating auto-immune disease that prevents him from practising dentistry.

He had a successful practice in Richmond Hill, a wife, Risa Goldenberg-Wexler, two young children (now there is a third) and a new custom-built home.

He soon found that because of poor financial advice, he had not been adequately insured. This meant a loss of $250,000 in income protection he should have had.

This realization and the hardships that he and his family had to endure led him to a new career, helping professionals avoid the nightmare that he and others face when not adequately insured.

He says he realized that he had a problem one morning when he felt some numbness and tingling in his fingertips. Within two weeks, he began to feel it in his feet. For months, he was told that it was stress. It took a year before he received a correct diagnosis: he had an extremely rare neuromuscular disorder, chronic inflammatory demyelinating polyradiculonneuropathy (CIDP).

It is not terminal or contagious, but despite medication, he developed a tremor and within a year he had to stop working.

Neuromuscular specialist, Dr. Vera Bril of The Toronto Hospital, General Division, made the diagnosis and put him on regular periodic treatments with IVIG, an intravenous immunoglobulin and within three weeks, he was able to run. "I was born again and given a second lease on life."

Dr. Ian Wexler

He hoped to return to dentistry, but discovered within two months, that although his condition was greatly improved, many of his symptoms reoccurred. With treatments every 10 to 12 weeks, he is able to control the weakness.

"But now what was I going to do with my life? I had a great long-term disability policy that was adequate when I took it out when I went into practice, but not adequate for a family with three children. Over the years, no one ever checked back with me as my family needs changed."

He had "a huge line of credit at the bank which could have been insured," he said, "and I had to pay deferred taxes. I never considered that the bank and Revenue Canada would come after me, but they did."

Angry at himself and his insurance broker, he realized that many other professionals could find themselves in the same position.

"We have life insurance, insurance on our homes and cars, but I discovered that the odds of becoming disabled are far greater than the other risks."

Dentists, doctors, lawyers and other professionals were calling him for advice and he became "an amateur disability consultant," he said. He was asked to speak to professional groups and discovered that disability protection was a very specialized area.

His accountant introduced him to Gary Opolsky, a disability expert who founded the GSO Insurance Group in North York, which helps professionals with their income protection portfolios. He worked as a consultant and broker at GSO for six months, and then entered into partnership with Opolsky.

"With government cutbacks, increased regulations for physicians, a reduction in income and changes in the insurance world, it is important to do an extensive analysis and periodic reviews of family needs, professional needs, loans and other considerations on an individual basis."

Wexler said he now sees himself as a missionary. "I consider disability insurance one of the most important purchases in your life. My situation has given me an understanding and the ability to put myself in the other person's position."

Toronto doctor gets award

TORONTO — An award rarely given to non-American scientists was recently presented to Dr. Gideon Koren of the University of Toronto.

Koren received the Rawls-Palmer Progress in Medicine Lecture Award of the American Society for Clinical Pharmacology and Therapeutics (ASCPT) for his achievements in developmental pharmacology and toxicology, recognizing his efforts to optimize patient care through clinical pharmacology and toxicology research.

Koren, a world leading expert, has contributed greatly to the development of maternal-fetal research. In 1985, in collaboration with the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, he created the Motherisk Program, an antenatal clinic for drug/chemical risk counselling.

Koren writes a bi-weekly Hebrew column for The CJN.

Quirky juxtapositions mark prints

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Naomi Harris' most compelling prints doesn't appear in her current five-day show at York University's Student Centre Gallery.

The work in question, a memorial to the 23-year-old artist's late grandmother, is spare in composition, but laden with texture and feeling. Somehow, though, Harris didn't think it was quite "appropriate" for the blue-toned etching to share display space with her more unorthodox gangster-themed work.

Unexpected juxtapositions, however, have become a hallmark of Harris' printmaking.

Her penchant for criminal themes is itself at odds with the kitchen table interview over herbal tea and cookies that preceded this article. She also likes plays on words — was that Serial Killers or Cereal Killers?

Now in her fourth year of Fine Arts at York University, Harris frowned over some of her earlier work. "It's nice, but it's not me."

Nice enough, incidentally, that she was approached at a previous show about buying her very first print, an etching of a beautifully rendered sweater she made in first year university.

As a child, Harris took summer lessons at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Her innate talent is probably the legacy of her maternal great-grandmother, Louella Wilson, who had artistic training but did not paint professionally.

"I like to think of myself as a funny person with an offbeat sense of humor," said Harris. "I want people to chuckle when they see my prints."

Her fondness for popular culture and quirky juxtapositions is evident in one of her favorite pieces that appears in the show.

Inspired by the Saint Valentine's Day Massacre, each print in the series of grisly vintage shots hangs from a fresh pink ribbon. Harris likes the contrast between one of

'Hot Docs' have Jewish themes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Among the entries at next week's fourth annual Canadian International Documentary Film Festival & Awards ("Hot Docs") at the Metropolitan Hotel are several films of Jewish interest.

Mischa, a riveting National Film Board of Canada documentary, pays homage to the virtuoso violinist Mischa Weisbord, who awed critics and who was universally known as "the new Paganini." Yet, when he died in 1991 in a fly-infested Brooklyn rooming house, he had sunk into abject obscurity.

The trajectory of his life is traced meticulously and with loving care by his nephew, David Vaisbord, who grew up with stories about Weisbord's amazing career.

A "marvellously original" musician, in the words of Yehudi Menuhin, Weisbord was emotionally immature, and never really recovered from the death of his beloved father — his manager — in 1938. Sadly, Weisbord drifted from country to country, failing to realize his full potential. Eventually, he became a recluse. Weisbord spent his last 30 years in New York City, a haggard eccentric who never quite adjusted to the 20th century. In Mischa, his story is beautifully told Kosky in Paradise explores the career of Barry Kosky, the youthful founder of Gilgul, a small Jewish theatre in Sydney that has staged classics like The Golem and The Dybbuk.

The bespectacled Kosky, who also directs lavish operatic productions such as Nabucco, is portrayed as pushy, opinionated, acerbic, creative and funny. No wonder he is considered the enfant terrible of Australian theatre.

Like the person himself, Kosky in Paradise sets off sparks.

Me and My Matchmaker is ostensibly about a Jewish shadchan from Chicago named Irene Nathan who has arranged 200 marriages. But in fact, Mark Wexler's quirky and likable movie transcends the borders of its inquiry.

Nathan, an utterly charming and feisty widow in her early or mid-60s, charges $400 for her services. Working out of her house, she is devoted to her traditional calling. As the film unfolds, we meet her mixed bag of clients, and are engaged by their observations and their preferences.

The subtext of Me and My Matchmaker is the evolving platonic relationship between Nathan and Wexler and her hidden feelings for him. Being conscientious, Nathan wants to marry off Wexler, 39, to a nice Jewish girl of his age range. "If you're lonely, you're ready [for marriage]," she advises him. But being romantically drawn to him, she does her level best to wean him off the three comely ladies she has introduced him to. This confusing and amusing conflict animates Me and My Matchmaker.

Children of Jerusalem: Ibrahim is one in a series of 30-minute documentaries that focus on the daily lives of Muslim and Jewish children in Israel and the territories.

The subject, Ibrahim Saadi, is 11 years old and is fluent in Arabic, Hebrew and English. The precocious Ibrahim, who attends an Anglican school and lives in East Jerusalem with his tight-knit family, describes himself as a "Palestinian Arab Israeli."

This modest but revealing documentary by the National Film Board of Canada is essentially a disarming profile of Ibrahim. He is seen playing soccer with a Spanish friend, doing homework, visiting his grandfather, hunting birds with his relatives, attending class, riding a bus through diverse neighborhoods in Jerusalem, walking in the Arab quarter and spending time with his two older sisters and parents.

Also on tap at the festival are two films I was unable to view in advance: Anaphase is a cinematic adaptation of a Batsheva Dance Company number, while Bronwen and Yaffa is an exploration of racism.

Alberstein concert a triumph

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chava Alberstein, Israel's first lady of song, has some advice for young lovers: "Don't talk to each other non-stop. Save some of it for older, colder days."

This message from a woman of a certain age herself struck a receptive chord with an audience of 700 at a gala concert at Beth Tikvah Synagogue celebrating anniversaries of the synagogue and the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University.

It was a triumph for Alberstein, whose eclectic repertoire touched the well-springs of our love for Israel and had the audience identify with that small country's history and its need for peace.

In her inimitable way, she flecked her performance with the humor of songs sung by Jews at summer camps and one of her own that promised a history of the Jews in five minutes.

"This is a genuine Israeli song from South America," she joked at one point.

The magnetic, petite singer responded to the audience's deep yearnings and her lush voice exemplified the beauty, depth and emotional range of the Hebrew language, a fact noted in advance by Paul Jacobs, Ben-Gurion Toronto chapter president.

Alberstein is a singer-actor with an exquisite sense of timing and ad-lib humor. "There is no backstage here," she said, "so I have to fake it that I went offstage and returned for an encore."

She sang songs from the yellowed pages of her parents' old song books.

One number, written in Russia at the end of the last century, and translated by her, has become, in her words, "a lullaby for the new chalutzim."

One was a tribute to the late Yitzhak Rabin, which she always dedicated to him when he was alive and continues to do. "Unfortunately the truth of the song did not conform to the reality and like others, he gave up his life for peace."

Funds from the concert will be split evenly between the two organizations.

Registration limited. Single program, $8. Carol, 416-789-3213.

In The Spotlight

Born in Moncton, N.B., 51 years ago, Moshe Yess lived in Toronto and Montreal as a child before moving with his parents to Hollywood, Calif., in 1962. For 16 years he worked as a folksinger, studio musician and nightclub performer. Somewhere along the line he met Naftali Estulin, a Lubavitch rabbi who "introduced me to a Judaism that I never knew as a child."

After living in Jerusalem for six years and playing in a band called the Megama Duo, Yess returned to Canada and eventually settled in Montreal. He lives with his wife and six children within walking distance of the Lubavitch yeshivah in Snowdon.

He still plays guitar and sings as a profession. He has recorded 16 albums of original folk songs, most in English. My Zaidy, his most famous song, "was used quite effectively by Orthodox rabbis around the world to promote a return to traditional Orthodox observance," he says.

Having made five musical tours playing to Orthodox Jewish audiences around the world, Yess still gets invited occasionally to perform. He gave a concert recently at the Bernard Betel Centre in Toronto as a guest of Tzivos Hashem, an arm of the Lubavitch movement. He has several upcoming concert dates in the New York area.

Three faiths explored

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Holy Land, Holy People is one of those relatively rare documentaries which fuse history, theology, geography and contemporary politics into a meaningful melange.

The six-part Vision TV film unfolds in weekly half-hour episodes starting on March 18 at 7:30 p.m. It explores the three "Abrahamic faith communities" (Judaism, Christianity and Islam), the misunderstandings and misconceptions which divide them and the central ideas they share.

The Children of Abraham, which kicks off the film, reminds us that these monotheistic religions trace their origins to Abraham.

All three are animated by a belief in love and social justice, a theme elaborated upon by an interfaith panel consisting of Rabbi Dow Marmur, Bishop Terrence Prendergast, Lila Fahlman and Imam Liatak Takim. The panelists exude reason, empathy and tolerance, qualities which haven't always manifested themselves among Jews, Christians and Muslims.

The Holy City, on March 25, explains the pivotal place of Jerusalem in Judaism, Christianity and Islam. A microcosm of the global village, the city exists simultaneously in the past, the present and the future, a creator and a destroyer of dreams.

The Desert, on April 1, focuses on the "theology of geography."

Moses and the Jewish people formed an eternal covenant in Sinai. John the Baptist established a ministry in the Judean wilderness. Mohammed retreated to a mountain cave in the Saudi emptiness, setting in motion the revelations of the Koran.

The Word, on April 8, examines the importance of sacred texts: the primacy of the Torah, the centrality of the Gospels and the immutability of the Koran.

Covenant and Reality, on April 15, juxtaposes the ideals with the practices of each religion. As we learn, racism, discrimination and sexism are perennial problems.

Last but not least, The Living Spirit highlights inter-faith dialogue. Christianity, though perhaps not Islam, has learned to accept the return of Jews to their homeland in Israel. Christianity, too, no longer blames Jews for the death of Jesus.

These concessions have made dialogue possible, but given the scourge of anti-Semitism, inter-faith dialogue is still underdeveloped in Israel.

With the end of the millennium drawing near, Jews, Christians and Muslims are exhorted to reflect so as to improve their often antagonistic relationship. Interestingly enough, Toronto is held up as a model of multiculturalism and coexistence.

Directed by Steven Deme and written by Dawn Deme, Holy Land, Holy People will doubtless be appreciated by both young people and adults. In an era of mindlessness and gratuitous violence on television, it is a sober example of television at its best.

Quirky juxtapositions

the prints and its heart-shaped frame formed of little paper flowers. Dangling from the picture is a "toe tag" bearing a pointed message.

As a double major in Fine Arts and Psychology, Harris first merged the two disciplines when the idea of "Freudian slips" popped into her head during a psychology class. The result was a triptych of vintage lingerie silk-screened with the image of Sigmund Freud.

Freudian Slips appears in Circumstantial Evidence, Harris' show running from March 10 to 14. Her first solo show, Circumstantial Evidence has at least two gangster-related works. Harris attributes her interest in the theme to her father, Jerry, who has "a real intense interest in the '30s and '40s."

While it's incidental to Harris' work that both Freud and some of the gangsters are Jewish, her work "is starting to take a turn toward more Jewish themes."

A graduate of Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Harris attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for one year before switching to Forest Hill Collegiate Institute.

The etching she dedicated to her late grandmother, Sarah Harris, features two elements: a print of Sarah Harris' housedress and the words to Oifn Pripechik, the Yiddish song Naomi remembers Sarah singing to her when she was a child.

Recently Naomi went to Sunnybrook Food Market to photograph meat for a printmaking project. An invitation to look behind the counter led to a return visit during which she spent several hours photographing the butchers kashering and preparing meat.

She started studying photography only last year and likes to photograph people going about their everyday activities. Her ideal is to "live with" her subjects and get to know them. "I think it's important to capture what's inside."

Morgentaler a difficult subject for Toronto journalist to profile

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Catherine Dunphy was in the early stages of researching her newly published biography Morgentaler: A Difficult Hero (Random House, $32), Canada's well-known abortion crusader asked her over lunch if she would like to "witness a procedure."

A short time later, Dunphy was chatting at Morgentaler's Toronto clinic with a stripper named Dominique, 11 weeks pregnant.

Thirty years ago, bored with his former life in suburban Montreal, Morgentaler began to perform this simple medical procedure, simultaneously adopting the pro-choice cause of a woman's right to abortion on demand as his own personal creed.

It was anything but a simple road. He's received countless death threats and attacks, such as when a stranger came at him with a pair of gardening shears. His cross-Canada clinics have been raided, set afire, blown up. In 1975 he was imprisoned for 10 months for performing an illegal abortion. He has also been pilloried by anonymous enemies for being Jewish.

Yet right from the start, the iconoclastic doctor decided not to play the role of the old-fashioned backstreet abortionist, working quietly in the vague shadows between morality and legality. Says Dunphy: "Henry said, 'There's no way I'm going to be quiet about this. And when I get caught, I'm not going to plead guilty. I'm going to take it right to the top.'"

Ultimately, that's just what he did. His greatest moment of victory occurred in January 1988, when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the abortion law, leaving in its place a legalistic vacuum that Morgentaler counts as his greatest achievement.

Born 74 years ago in Lodz, Morgentaler was incarcerated nearly five years in the Lodz ghetto, then briefly in Auschwitz, then Dachau. He lost his father, mother and only sister in the Holocaust. A secular humanist, his untiring battle for women's reproductive rights is treated as a legacy of his wartime persecution.

Dunphy adequately demonstrates that Morgentaler can be a difficult, egocentric person whose political agendas often ran counter to those of his feminist supporters, some of whom grew weary of perpetually raising money for his legal defence. He has had troubled relations with family members who often went long periods without talking to him.

Dunphy, a feature writer for the Toronto Star, found him a difficult subject on a journalistic level as well. "For a man who loves the spotlight, he's very private, and it must be scary for him to have so much of himself revealed. He's accustomed to the attention that a feature newspaper article would give him. I've tried to show the human side of him and I'm not sure he's comfortable with that."

Does this complex, compulsive crusader genuinely qualify as a hero? Certainly many women he has helped out of their troubles, and many within the pro-choice movement, would quickly say yes. This book is for them. Others might find this a competent albeit tedious book. A media sensation, Morgentaler certainly deserves his 15 minutes of fame, but a more balanced approach would have focused more on the issues and less on the man.

Business centre opens in Gaza

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A ground-breaking ceremony for the Gaza Strip's first business centre took place recently north of Gaza City.

The business centre, which will include a luxury Marriott hotel and 150,000 square feet of office space, will be dedicated to U.S. secretary of commerce Ron Brown, who was killed in a plane crash last year.

Brown, who believed that peace and economic growth go hand in hand, had said that "This facility will signify that Gaza is open for business."

The $100-million project is expected to employ 2,000 workers during the construction phase and will create up to 4,000 jobs once it is completed.

Roger Neilson to head hockey camp in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nineteen ninety-seven could turn out to be a banner year for hockey in the Holy Land. Not only will Israel host the first-ever hockey competition at the Maccabiah Games, but Metulla will also be the scene of a professionally-run hockey camp later in the summer.

St. Louis Blues' associate coach Roger Neilson, Captain Video himself, will lead a team of six shinny experts to the Canada Centre rink in Metulla to conduct a hockey camp along the lines of the one he runs every summer in Lindsay, Ont., said United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada spokesperson Eli Rubenstein.

Joining Neilson will be two as yet unnamed NHL players as well as staff from Roger Neilson's Hockey Camp. The two-week program is set to run from Aug. 10 to 14 and then again from Aug. 17 to 21. Due to commitments to his Lindsay camp, Neilson and his associates will only be available for the second half of the program.

The project is sponsored by the UIA and the Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) in cooperation with Canada Centre, a recreational complex in Metulla built largely with funds raised in Canada.

Making the Canadian connection complete is a plan to bring 15 to 20 youngsters from Canada to the camp as part of a unique summer experience. They'll be joined by 30 to 40 pucksters from Israel who'll share the on-ice learning experience while developing social ties with Jewish teens from Canada.

"It'll be fantastic," exults Rubenstein. "It's Israel, it's hockey, it's Judaism...everything a Canadian Jew would dream about."

The program will help promote camaraderie involving young Israelis and Canadians, says Adam Minsky, national education director of CIEC. "The opportunity is to form close ties with Israeli kids through a common sport."

Although hockey may be the selling point for this particular program, there's more to it than merely learning about faceoffs and forechecking. Canadian visitors, expected to range in age from 14 to 18, will be taken on tours of Israel's north, enjoy a Shabbaton, and experience "adventure activities" like mountain bike excursions and hiking, Minsky said.

Also on the agenda will be activities related to environmental conservation and Jewish identity, said Amnon Shinar, director of UIA Canada's Israel office.

The $60,000 (US) program is subsidized by the UIA, but each Canadian participant is being asked to pay for airfare and contribute $500 (US). In addition, Shinar is canvassing potential Israeli and Canadian sponsors to help underwrite the program, while Marshall Starkman, a goaltending instructor at Neilson's summer camp is doing the same in Canada.

Neilson and his hockey instructors will be fully subsidized, said Starkman, one of the two visionaries who conceived of the program.

Neilson, who served as head coach of the Toronto Maple Leafs, New York Rangers and Florida Panthers in a 20-year NHL career, didn't need much convincing before he agreed to participate in the program. In fact, when the Blues coach was first contacted, he practically jumped at the opportunity to visit Israel, Starkman said.

For Neilson, it'll be his third visit to the Holy Land. He first visited Israel in 1980 and then again last summer, when he took a group of university students on a 13-country grand tour that began in Capetown, South Africa, and ended in Tel Aviv.

"Of the 13 countries we visited, all the guys liked Israel the best," Neilson said. "They were impressed with the biblical sites and the history." They also enjoyed swimming in the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee, places they'd previously heard about. They were enthralled with Jerusalem, a place Neilson described as "one of the most interesting cities in the world," and the boys stayed up late enjoying Tel Aviv's nightlife.

A student of Israel and its conflicts with its Arab neighbors, Neilson said he was particularly interested by the drive from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem where you can see the burned-out hulks of armored vehicles still on the roadside.

Neilson said he and his staff hope to spend several days touring the country after the hockey camp.

Starkman, 27, is likewise relishing a return to Israel. He was in Metulla last spring working as a volunteer at Canada Centre when he and fellow Canuck Jeff Budd, director of volunteers at the facility, went for a skate.

"We were discussing how nice it would be to bring a hockey school to Israel and I said, 'I might be able to arrange something like that with Roger,'" Starkman recalled. When he called Neilson from Israel, Starkman immediately got a positive response. Others from Neilson's hockey school have also come on board.

In addition to Neilson and Starkman, other instructors will include Alex Andjelic, who currently coaches in Utrecht, Holland; Paul Bedford, general manager and coach of the Lindsay Muskies, a Junior A team; and two pros. Although they are not yet confirmed as part of the instructional team, Dallas Eakins of New York Rangers, Kris King of the Phoenix Coyotes, Bill Lindsay of the Florida Panthers and Craig Johnson of the Los Angeles Kings are among those being considered, Neilson said.

Co-writer and director of an instructional video called The Puck Stops Here II, Starkman pointed out that regardless of the NHLers who sign on, the level of instruction will be comparable to that at a Canadian hockey camp. Andjelic, he said, is a well-known coach on the international scene who served as George Kingston's assistant with the German entry at last fall's World Cup. He's also the head instructor at the Lindsay camp and he'll coordinate the on-ice activities in Metulla, he added.

From Shinar's perspective, the camp cements a longstanding relationship between Canadians and Metulla and could serve as a catalyst to entice young Canadian participants to work at the recreation centre.

"The combination of Canada's national sport and Canada Centre is too good to miss," Shinar said. "We'll evaluate the summer camp and if it's positive, we'd like to continue it in years to come."

For more information about corporate sponsorships, contact Starkman at 905-940-9229 or fax him at 905-940-9761.

Anyone interested in supporting the program can contact Rubenstein at 416-636-7655.

To participate in the camp, contact the CIEC at 416-398-6931.

SS officer to face trial for role in 1944 massacre

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — A military court has ordered former SS major Karl Hass to stand trial April 14 for his role in Italy's worst World War II atrocity.

It remains to be seen whether Hass, 84, will be tried with former Nazi SS captain Erich Priebke, who faces a retrial for his complicity in the March 24, 1944, massacre of 335 men and boys at the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome. About 75 of the victims were Jews.

Both trials will be before military courts.

Judicial sources said the two men probably would be tried together.

In August, a military court found the 83-year-old Priebke guilty of involvement in the massacre. But the court freed him, ruling that he could not be punished because the statute of limitations had run out and because of other extenuating circumstances.

That verdict triggered protests by family members of the victims, who barricaded the courthouse for eight hours until Priebke was rearrested, pending an extradition request from Germany.

Three months later, the verdict was annulled by an appeals court, which ruled that the judges had been openly biased in Priebke's favor.

Priebke has admitted to killing two of the victims, but says he was following orders.

Hass, who was a prosecution witness at the first Priebke trial, tried to avoid testifying by jumping out of his hotel balcony, breaking his hip during the escape attempt.

He has been held under house arrest ever since in a private clinic near Rome.

The military court last week set the trial date for Hass, who also was charged after he admitted taking part in the massacre during his testimony in the first Priebke trial.

In a related development, Italy's national pension office has revealed that Hass, who has lived in Italy for decades, receives state pensions from both Italy and Germany. Hass draws nearly $120 a month from Italy and about $530 a month from Germany.

The pension office said in a statement that Hass's pension came from "10 years of contributions paid in for work carried out in Italy in the 1950s and 1960s."

FILO HAMANTASHEN

Syrup 1/2 cup sugar, 1/4 cup water, 1 tsp. lemon juice, 1 tblsp. honey

Bring sugar, water, lemon juice to boil, stirring until sugar dissolves. Cook briskly for 5 min. Stir in honey. Set aside.

1/4 lb. butter or margarine, 1/4 cup oil, 1/2—1 cup ground walnuts, 1/2 lb. filo dough (keep filo covered with damp tea towel as not to dry out)

Fillings of choice. Peanut butter with chocolate chips is a good combination. Poppy seeds and other more traditional fillings may also be used.

Heat butter and oil just to melt. Cut filo into 6 strips. Place damp tea towel on work surface. Place waxed paper over damp towel. Place a strip of filo on wax paper. Brush with butter/oil. Sprinkle lightly with ground nuts. Place a teaspoon of filling about an inch from the edge. Fold strip to form a triangle and then fold over in continuous triangles until strip is completely folded. Repeat with other strips. Place on foil lined and greased cookie sheets. Brush filos with butter/oil. Bake 15-20 mins. - until golden brown 350°F. Spoon syrup over hamentashen. Cool on rack. Yield: 6 servings.

Revamped direct election law is gaining momentum

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An initiative is gaining momentum to change the direct election law so that a prime minister can be dismissed by a majority of 61 MKs, without dispersing the Knesset and holding general elections.

MKs from both the Likud and the opposition are calling for the change, in view of the coalition crisis and the possibility that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu might be toppled by a no-confidence vote.

At present, only a majority of at least 80 MKs can vote the prime minister out of office and initiate new elections for prime minister.

The MKs in favor of changing the law say that even if the government must be changed, it doesn't mean the Knesset should be replaced as well, and they call for the separation of the two issues.

MK Michael Kleiner of Gesher, head of the 20 MKs forming the Eretz Yisrael Front opposing Netanyahu's policies from within the coalition, was to convene the group this week to promote legislation that would enable MKs to topple the government with a majority of 61, without dispersing the Knesset.

MKs Ehud Barak of Labor and David Re'em of the Likud have also called for a change in the law.

National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon joined the initiative last weekend, coming out against the direct election system.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

Do I really need to send a thank you note every time I've had an interview? Is a postcard good enough?

Dear Reader,

Yes! You should send a thank you note every time you attend an interview. These days, some people send postcards, e-mail or faxes and though a postcard is OK, a short note, prepared on a word processor, is far better.

Postcards are not really appropriate in that your words are then shared with whomever picks up the card; therefore, confidentiality cannot be maintained. The same possibilities also exist for e-mails and faxes. Another consideration is that the job for which you have been interviewed may not be internally advertised.

The thank you letter is your way of expressing your gratitude for the appointment, but also reinforces your interest in the job and offers a recap of a few of your strongest points.

A three or four paragraph letter should do the trick. Begin by addressing the letter the same way you would your cover letter; then begin with a statement indicating your gratitude. A statement like "I am writing to thank you for the time you spent with me yesterday to talk about" is a good lead. You would then end this paragraph describing very briefly the reason for your meeting.

In the second paragraph, reiterate your interest in a position with this organisation. If a specific position is vacant and was the topic of your discussion, stress the reasons why you should be considered. Mention the fact that because of your experience you believe you could make an immediate contribution to the organisation.

In the third paragraph, discuss how you as a person fit in with the other people already employed in that organisation or mention your ability to adapt to a company's working style.

In the closing paragraph, thank the interviewer one more time and mention you look forward to hearing from him or her in the near future.

Making a note this long is not a requirement, but it does afford you one final opportunity of showing your ability to communicate and your understanding of business etiquette.

Construction set for Har Choma

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A conciliatory visit by Jordan's King Hussein and warnings of Palestinian violence by Israeli security forces failed to deter Israeli plans to break ground for a new Jewish housing project in southeastern Jerusalem.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that Israel would stand firm on its decision to build at Har Choma despite Arab and international pressure to back down.

"There is no change," Netanyahu said at a joint news conference with Hussein at the King David Hotel after their meeting."Our friends can agree or not. We understand the concerns of the Palestinians and others, but we made a decision."

The Israeli Cabinet voted unanimously last week to start building this week at Har Choma.

The decision was made despite assessments from security officials who said the construction could prompt Palestinian violence, including new terror attacks against Israel.

Netanyahu had pressed for the construction to counter recent threats from members of his coalition that they would vote no-confidence in his government if the project did not begin.

Meanwhile, the opposition Labor Party said it would press ahead with

From the editor

Last year, on the front page of our Purim issue, we wrote the following: "We are not unmindful of the incongruity in the almost surrealistic juxtaposition...in this issue of the paper, of the painful images of mourning and death alongside sweetly innocent representations of Purim drawn by children from across Canada."

One year later, we again stare numbly at the melancholy face of that bitter incongruity. The nightmare recurs; the painful images have returned. But this year, we substitute for Hamas an evil or deranged Jordanian soldier. We substitute for the busy streets of Jerusalem, the formerly peaceful promontory of Naharayim. We substitute for the number 24 dead, the number seven.

But we will never substitute even the most infinitesimal measure of grief for the seven unique universes that have now been shattered, or of outrage at the cowardly act, or of determination to proclaim to the craven killers of children: "We shall not die, but live."

Thus, we must perforce repeat this year, what we wrote last year. "Despite the incongruity, we decided to continue with our Purim presentation, lest the...murderers steal from our children our holidays and our heritage, even as they stole from the people whom they killed the lives that were so precious."

Purim: The Brief in News

WHAT A WORLD!

CJN on the Move

TORONTO — The CJN's board of directors today announced it would change the paper's look. The front page picture will no longer appear on page 1. Instead, it will be hidden in different parts of the paper. Other planned changes are an extended index with a pull-out flap and the merger of Sports with Travel, Arts and Business to form a new STAB section. Plans to provide shul times in Toronto and Montreal were put on hold due to the large number of shuls in each city that cannot agree when to hold services.

The paper will go ahead, though, with plans to open a winter office in Boca Raton, Fla.

New Directions

TORONTO — The Jewish National Fund has announced that, with development of the Negev Desert well under way, it would turn its attention to a new project.

"Enough sand already," commented one official. "It's so hard to get out of our clothes after a mission."

Passover Cleanup

TORONTO — Thousands of Jewish students descended on the main campuses of the University of Toronto, York University and McGill University to get an early start on preparation for Passover.

The eager students, carrying traditional goose feathers and paper bags, plan to wipe the campuses free of chametz.

"Not one speck shall remain," vowed one eager student.

Mega-Agency

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Mike Harris says he would like to see streamlined "the alphabet soup" of Jewish communal agencies in Toronto into one mega-agency.

The planned "Jews 'r Us" will be known as CJCJIASJFCSCJCF-BBCCICCICFJNF for short.

Dinner From A to Z

TORONTO — The Jewish community has run out of dinner honorees, following last week's glitzy tribute to Ziggy Zylberberg.

"That's pretty much everybody," said Canadian Jewish Committee president Holdie Gershon. "Guess we'll just have to start over."

Thus, Aaron Aaronson will be honored at next week's annual Honoree of the Year late luncheon/early dinner.

Eggleton Centre

TORONTO — The Technical Institute is planning to devote an entire research centre to study Art Eggleton, minister for international trade.

Beth Hanashim

MONTREAL — Following months of pressure from members, Congregation Beth Hanashim has decided to allow men to have aliyot.

"I suppose it's time," sighed president Vashti Cohen. "I mean, men are people too."

New CJN Feature

TORONTO — In a bold editorial decision, CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat-de-Dat announced today the newspaper will introduce a new page 3 feature: Herring of the Week.

The honor of the first-ever CJN Herring of the Week will go to the shmaltzed filets from the lovely Bernstein Kiddush at the Beth Dagim last shabbat.

Bobsledding

TEL AVIV — Spurred on by the inspiring example of Jamaica, Israel this week announced its inaugural bobsled team.

The maiden meeting of the Israeli Bobsled Association ended in pandemonium, however, when no one could agree on who would steer the sled or in which direction.

Aliyah Statistics

JERUSALEM — Israel received 76,600 new immigrants in 1996 from all over the world, according to a well-informed Jewish Agency official, including a few from the U.S. and Canada.

Threats Ignored

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rejected threats from one coalition member to withdraw his support for the government if the prime minister caved in to the threats from his other coalition partners to withdraw their support for the government.

Arafat in Nashville

NASHVILLE — Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat recently ended a three-week visit to Nashville.

Arafat, who reportedly developed a love of country music during his years of exile in Tunis, took part in a hoedown and appeared at the Grand Ole Opry.

"He's just a good 'ole country boy at heart," said one participant.

Commenting on the stalled peace process, Arafat, said he was "a little bit country while [Netanyahu] was a little bit rock and roll."

Women of the New Wall

JERUSALEM – In an apparent bid to resolve the Women of the Wall issue, Israel's Supreme Court said the government has to build a new wall complete with indoor plumbing.

ISRAEL TO ANNEX FLORIDA

Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir has announced that as of April 1972, Florida will be annexed into the state of Israel.

"The way I look at it, more Jews visit Florida than Israel," Meir said. "Besides, the neighbors are friendlier and the kishka is not as heavy."

U.S. satellite reports already show a PLO base being set up in Georgia and Louisiana. U.S. President Richard Nixon was unavailable for comment. Aides say he was too busy looking for lost tapes.

SOVEREIGNTY ISSUE DEAD: LEVESQUE

The sovereignty issue in Quebec is dead, PQ leader Rene Levesque said.

"The issue of separation will never be raised again. Quebec's future in Canada is secure. I can assure the Jewish community that 25 years from now they won't have to worry about a thing. The PQ welcomes all money and ethnics."

Levesque also told reporters here that he is quitting smoking and will leave politics to help other people kick the habit.

Harris to amalgamate Toronto synagogues

By BADANAH PANZER
Staff Reporter
With files from Leila Speisman

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Mike Harris has announced an addition to his controversial mega-city bill.

"It is not enough to amalgamate the cities comprising Metropolitan Toronto into one city. My government has decided to disband all the synagogues in Metro and combine them all into one giant shul, a megashul, if you will."

A press release sent anonymously to The CJN said that Harris' decision is in line with his concern for the spiritual welfare of the citizens of the province, as shown by his recent hospital closings, which studies have shown to have increased the frequency and fervency of prayer in the province.

'People can vote for service times'

The amalgamation of the synagogues, said press officer Hilary Huntington-Talbot, speaking from his office in North Bay, will stop the needless proliferation of services.

"Right now," he said, "there are prayer services all over the place, and mostly at the same time, on Saturday morning. With amalgamation, there will be just one service, which will save on personnel costs, as well as such infrastructure expenses as heating and electricity."

The government believes that it will be more democratic as well, he said. "People can vote to hold services on a Thursday night, for instance, if that is more convenient for the majority."

Huntington-Talbot pointed out the "wastefulness" of having different kinds of synagogues.

Single caterer to handle mega-shul

"I have been told there are Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist, secular, and something called chassidic. This is an obvious waste of resources, personnel, and news bulletins."

The Vaad HaKashruth reports that it was necessary to call the police to its Bathurst Street offices to keep order among those clamoring to be the sole caterer for the megashul.

"We don't know how anyone will possibly choose," lamented the staff, who were seen packing their personal belongings for a hasty exit out the back door.

Israel Bonds said that there was something to be said for the megashul, as there would be only one Yom Kippur Bond drive, and they wouldn't have to shlep around from synagogue to synagogue picking up pledge cards.

Bessie Cohen, from Congregation Anshei Montreal Beth Winnipeg B'nai Dnepepetrovsk, who has been president of her shul's sisterhood for 43 years, looks forward to the challenge "of branching out to the greater community, and doing for everyone what I have done so well for just my shul."

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith were in accord in condemning Harris' action. "It is essential for Jewish continuity that there continue to be obfuscation of the primal issues that concern the demographically diverse multicultural aspect of the Jewish community and contribute to its disestablishment," said a joint communique.

Purim in The GTA

A Purim spiel

Into a land which is as green in springtime as a thousand shining emeralds and as white in winter as a carpet of newly woven white cotton ringlets, where water flows freely in every acre, and trees and flowers crowd every meadow up to the very edge of the permanent frost, where ores and stones and minerals and oils peek and pour from the ground like juice in a punctured over-ripe melon, a wise, elderly visitor once came.

He was invited to this very beautiful and bounteous land by a small group of people who had heard of his gentle but far-reaching wisdom and who felt in need of it because of their bewilderment at the great anger that had settled across their large, expansive land.

The leaders of the beautiful and bounteous land often quarreled among themselves. When they did not quarrel among themselves, they spoke often to the people whom they were elected to lead.

But the people whom they were leading suspected their leaders as being of dubious logic because, even though they spoke often, the leaders were reluctant to do so before they first consulted a secret cadre of expensive uh-pollsterers.

The leaders relied on the secret uh-pollsterers the way the ancient Greek leaders relied upon their oracles.

The polls that the uh-pollsterers pulled out of their holsters were magical. They held the same hidden truths and mystical wonders that were in the gizzards and the innards of the chickens on which the ancient oracles relied.

And the people had to pay for these magic polls just as the ancient Greeks had to pay for the chickens.

Without the magic polls, however, it seemed that the leaders were lost.

In every region across the land, they built legislative chambers and in every legislative chamber they invited their secret uh-pollsterers to help them legislate.

One of the more puzzling practices the leaders adopted was a curious and oddly entertaining ritual they called Question Period. It lasted for an hour. But in the same way an hour in the school yard or in the playground can seem like half a day, especially if a bully is there, so too did Question Period.

As a legislative ritual, Question Period was a misnomer. It could have, perhaps should have, been called Shouting Period or Embarrassment Period or even Nasty Period.

No one really asked a question, at least not for the purpose of eliciting information. Rather, they posed tricks and traps in the hope that an unsuspecting or idiotic leader from the other side would embarrass himself before the people and thus fall out of their favor.

When the trick was suspected or when the trap failed, the poser of the question would invariably pout and begin shouting at the leader who failed to fall. Then, of course, they quarreled.

One shout begot another and then another until the air of the legislative chambers would become filled with nasty vapors of exhaled insults and childish taunts.

Once, in the big chamber of chambers, a leader from one side even asked a leader from the other side if he had "gonads" and if he did, "did he want to fight?"

Thankfully, the people did not hear the answer because they were sore afraid of what might have happened to the gonads if they had been broken in the fight.

Upon hearing of this question and answer in Question Period and after seeing it repeated a hundred times or more on the news and in between periods of hockey games, many children in the land suffered nightmares. An inordinate number of absences were reported in elementary schools for a month after that Question Period until the question was forgotten along with all the other questions asked by the leaders.

Not long after that question was asked in the big chamber of chambers, one of the leaders in a smaller, but still big, legislative chamber was asked a question to help relieve the fears and the worries of thousands of the people whom he led, who spent more than eight hours of each day trying to heal and comfort sick people but who were on the verge of losing their jobs.

Being thoughtful and sensitive and fortified with the impenetrable wisdom of his expensive uh-pollsterers, the leader confidently calmed the people's fears by invoking the memory of an ancient pastime, long since abandoned by the parents and the grandparents of the people: the hula-hoop.

The leader's answer was spread far and wide. It was recorded in the official registry of answers and talked about for days, if not months, so that everyone saw the true measure of his wisdom.

No wonder the people were bewildered. No wonder a great anger had settled across their large, expansive land.

But even the visitor, wiser by far than any owl, could not understand the great anger that existed in a land so beautiful and bounteous, a land that was so grand and so full of the rich, dark brown, sustaining earth of life.

He had no wisdom to impart to the small group that had invited him to visit, for he knew in his heart of hearts, that people often get the leaders they deserve.

One day, merely hours before the old visitor was set to return home, a poor Jew came to him.

He came because he needed to ask a question about the special rituals of Purim and because he knew the wise old man would know how to answer. He told the wise man that he could not afford to buy wine for the festive seudah. Thus he wanted to know if he could make the holy blessing at the Purim seudah over a glass of milk.

"Never mind your question," said the wise man, reaching for his wallet. He then gave the poor man $100.

"Why did you give the poor Jew $100 to buy some wine," asked one of the people in the small group who had gathered to say good bye to the old visitor, "when you know a bottle of wine can be bought for only $10?"

The visitor simply smiled and said, "When a poor Jew asks if he can use milk for a special seudah because he cannot afford to buy wine, it is obvious that he cannot afford to buy meat either."

The visitor then returned home, to a land where people still dreamed and believed in possibilities for themselves and for their children.

But the small group that had invited him and had gathered to bid him farewell, wondered if the visitor had been wise after all. For they knew with certainty that no leader, nor any uh-pollsterer, would give $100 to buy a $10 bottle of wine.

PM Harris to merge Canada's provinces

Ten Years From Now

By JEFF ROSEN
News Editor

ONTARIO – The federal government of Conservative Prime Minister Michael Harris today announced that it would soon begin plans to amalgamate the remaining provinces of Canada.

"Why have 11 health departments, 11 finance departments, etc. when one will do," said the former premier of Ontario. "We outlined in our election plan, The Common Sense Revolution, Part V – You Ain't Seen Nothing Yet! our desire to create a unified country. And a unified country we will get."

Under the government's proposal, the provincial governments would disappear, to be replaced by ministers responsible for the former provinces.

Harris said Ontario will have the least trouble adapting to the new regime since it has managed to eliminate the municipal level of government, a project first started when Harris was premier.

Under the Tories, the government first moved to create a unified Toronto. While initially opposed, the public eventually warmed to the idea after Mel "No-body" Lastman was elected mayor.

However, fueled by its initial success, the provincial government extended its plan, allowing the new mega-city to first swallow surrounding regions and then push out in all directions to gobble up the entire province. Finally, one day, the provincial government woke up and discovered that Toronto covered the same area as Ontario.

This time out, Harris promises amalgamation will be both "kinder and gentler."

"We don't want to see anyone put out of work," Harris mused. "And no one will, at least in most of the provinces."

Pressed on how he will ensure this, the Tory leader said they are considering relocating all of the unemployed to Nova Scotia.

Premier Snobelman

"It's perfect," said Harris. "It will be the start of a bold, new experiment — no jobs and a cash-less society. And of course, we will keep one hospital open there, as we will in other jurisdictions."

Opposition to the mega-country announcement came from Toronto premier John Snobelman who vowed to protect the rights of every Torontonian in the province.

"We're such a warm, loving community in our own right. We have our hospital which is open five days a week in North Bay, we have our school board which oversees the thousands of students here. What do we have in common with the farmers and fisherpersons out there."

Federal fisherman minister Dave Tsabuchi was insensed by the premier's remarks. He was overheard saying "listen, there's tuna enough to go around."

Harris said the move will probably result in lower taxes but declined to comment on a study done by the British Columbian anti-racism coalition which found that it would hurt ethnics to a greater degree.

"Anti-Semitism, pure and simple," said the leader of a major Jewish group. "We will launch a national probe to look into this witch hunt. And of course I will take personal responsibility for it, just as soon as I have my picture taken with the prime minister."

U.S. President Hillary Clinton said they were monitoring Canada's situation closely, but would not comment if she was considering a similar move for her own country. At least not until after dinner.

In Israel, coalition prime ministers Ariel Sharak and Yesser Arabfat praised the initiative, saying that it mirrored one undertaken years ago when Israel, Egypt and Jordan united to form one country called Isregan.

"We solved all our problems by eliminating directions," said Arabfat, wearing the same clothes he has worn for years. "This way no one knows where they are going and there is no West Bank."

Israeli tomatoes help fight assimilation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Researchers at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care have isolated a substance in Israeli tomatoes they believe could play a role in combating assimilation.

Studies began three years ago after a 95-year-old patient sang Havah Nagilah following a meal of spaghetti and tomato sauce.

The concentrated sauce was made from 120 tomatoes grown on Kibbutz Yerakot in southern Israel. According to a Baycrest spokesperson, nobody in the Diaspora had ever used so many of the tomatoes in one recipe, because of their high cost outside of Israel.

It was the first time the patient had uttered a word in months. Her son, a businessman and philanthropist with little previous interest in Judaism, requested anonymity for the family.

Still incredulous over his own intense desire to attend synagogue (which hasn't abated since he sampled the home-made sauce), he is following the research with interest. His 24-year-old daughter, to the family's astonishment, voluntarily attended a Jewish singles' dance.

A sodium isotope, dubbed Tevye-5 by the Baycrest research team, is believed to be responsible for the behavioral changes.

In controlled studies, chimpanzees injected with the isotope learned Hebrew sign language in five weeks. Subjects in the placebo group were unable to master it, although — like those in the "Tevye" group — they were already fluent in American Sign Language.

"We are very excited by this major breakthrough," said Dr. Michael Gordon, medical director of Baycrest.

The chimps suffered no apparent side effects, although the baby of the group, 18-month-old Zelda, escaped one night, ran across Bathurst Street and broke into a kosher food establishment, where police found her eating gefilte fish.

Testing on human subjects is the next step, said Gordon. To date, 5,000 Jewish parents have contacted him to request that their children participate in the study.

The injectable vaccine and an alternative in pill form are being produced by two local pharmaceutical giants. Barring unforeseen complications, both forms should be available to the public before the turn of the millennium.

"This could create an unprecedented demand for Israel Experience trips. Maybe I should hire more staff," said Liz Sokolsky, national executive director of the Canada Israel Experience Centre, which opened last year.

"This Tevye thing has tremendous implications," agreed Susan Jackson, director of continuity programming, UJA Federation, which provided a $36,000 continuity grant for the research. (The counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism also provided seed money.)

Although pure Tevye-5 is costly to produce, scientists found they could use less of it without mitigating its effect by adding less expensive chick pea extract.

"Who ARE these scientific food Jews?" asked Jackson. "Is this someone's idea of a joke?"

Congress, B'nai Brith get set to merge

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In a long-expected move timed with Purim, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith (BB) have decided to unite into one organization.

"This should have happened a long time ago," leaders from the two organizations, who declined to have their names mentioned because they did not feel the need for publicity, told The CJN.

"We've been working together so closely and for so long, we figured that there was no point in having all that extra staff and money going to waste," they said.

There were other reasons for the merger as well, said the anonymous CJC and BB officials. Among them:

• The growing realization among CJC and BB leaders that their organizations were taking up far too much headline and copy space in the local press and were the subject of a disproportionately high level of media attention.

"We just did not need all that publicity," the organizations' spokespersons said in unison. "We were really getting sick and tired of it."

• And the abandonment in Quebec of all ethno-nationalistic and separatist sentiment. "We were fools all these years," said a high-ranking official of the formerly separatist Quebec government recently. "How could we have been so wrong?"

The formerly tense situation between previously opposing linguistic and nationalistic forces in Quebec has changed so much, that officials who once worked for Quebec's now-defunct language watchdog group, the Office de la langue française, have begun to volunteer in droves for B'nai Brith's annual Passover Basket campaign.

> 'It would be a dream come true'

And at CJC headquarters recently, a well-know formerly separatist journalist was overheard pleading for forgiveness for his past ways. Everyone was crying, according to one source.

"Things have gotten so much better, we just might have to dissolve even the merged organization pretty soon," the BB and CJC officials said hopefully.

"It would be a dream come true!"

'Oy vey! Toronto's treif,' declares rabbi

Mixed shopping cited as one problem

By BADANAH PANZER
Staff Reporter
With files from Leila Speisman

TORONTO — Rabbi Pinchas Yehuda Leib Obergegessen, who recently moved to Toronto from a small enclave in Jerusalem, has declared the entire Jewish community unkosher.

"Pah! Feh! The whole place is treif!" said a press release issued by his secretary, Reb Yaakov Ichhobtsuris.

The rabbi's edict included all butcher shops, bakeries, grocery stores, institutions, synagogues and car pools in the city.

In an interview with The CJN, Rabbi Obergegessen explained that he had no wish to cause dissension. "It is all for your own good," he said earnestly.

He said that he was horrified by what he found when he arrived.

"There is only one kashruth supervisory body here," he thundered. "Not one person on staff there is over 75. Furthermore, not one of their administrators or staff attended the great Yeshiva Ohevei Chumros, which, of course, I had the great merit to attend. So what could they know?"

He itemized some of his objections: Butcher shops selling meat with only two hechshers; grocery stores allowing men and women to shop at the same time; and worst of all, bakeries that make hamantashen with strawberry filling, instead of prune or poppy seed, "as is commanded in our holy books, and as I explained at great length in my seminal work Piskei Hamantashen.

"And then," he said, there is the car pool. "I personally saw vans in which the children threw milchik and pareve garbage in the same wastebasket."

Reaction to Rabbi Obergegessen's action was swift.

The Torah-True Rabbinical Council said that they had had their suspicions for some time, but in the interests of unity had withheld action. They ordered Rabbi Obergegessen to report to a Beit Din immediately.

He refused.

The GTA and Hinterland Board of Rabbis said they were "saddened" by this decision. "It would never have happened if Conservative and Reform rabbis were allowed to perform conversions in Israel," said a press release.

The Toronto Friends of Those Awaiting the Imminent Coming of the Messiah said that this was another proof that the Messiah was indeed on his way. "When have you seen the community have such a united reaction to anything?" an irate phone message said.

B'nai Brith issued a press release saying they were "shocked and appalled" by the edict. "It is another example that Canadian Jewish Congress is incompetent and has sold out to the establishment."

CJC blasted Rabbi Obergegessen, saying that the whole affair distracted people from worrying about the restructuring of federations across Canada.

Surah Chayah Gittel Messerschmidt, speaking from her car phone, said "I just bet his wife did all the car pools in his family. He probably never tried to shlep 10 kids to five different schools first thing in the morning."

Ashley Goldenberg, with her daughter Savannah, called Rabbi Obergegessen "a product of the patriarchal system that oppresses women in the name of the Jewish religion."

As this article went to press, Rabbi Obergegessen called this reporter to complain about the lack of respect for rabbinical authority in the city. "I think I will go back where I came from — there everyone listened to me."

Culture of hatred

On the very same day that a Jordanian soldier massacred seven and wounded six Israeli schoolgirls who were visiting Naharayim, the Island of Peace, the General Assembly of the United Nations voted to condemn Israel for its determination to proceed with the Har Choma housing project.

On the surface the two events appear to have been unrelated; but in truth, they were not. The former was the product of what the Jerusalem Post has aptly described as the "culture of hatred against Israel that permeates the Arab world." The latter was one more poisonous ingredient thrown into the noxious potion from which that culture pours forth.

One Israeli commentator observed that the murder of the schoolchildren was the "lethal evidence of the volatile political atmosphere last week in the wake of King Hussein's emotionally-charged letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the artificial tension created by the Palestinians."

To be sure, King Hussein never intended his public criticism of Netanyahu to inspire the soldier's murderous act. His visit last weekend to the grieving families of the seven children was poignant proof of his sincere contrition. But there can be no doubt his much-publicized denunciation of Netanyahu helped to stir emotions in an already delicate emotional situation.

So too will the vote in the General Assembly. Orchestrated by the Palestinian Authority (PA), it spreads a harsh but false accusation that the government of Israel is a violator of Oslo and a threat to peace. In its turn, the accusation will become yet another contamination of the truth poisoning the minds and the hearts of people against Israel. More ominously, however, the vote directly challenges Israel's promise that Jerusalem will never again be divided.

It is therefore with great disappointment we note Canada's support of the General Assembly resolution. Regrettably, Canada thus helps foster the invidious culture of hatred against Israel and is willingly complicit in the campaign to undermine the Jewish claim to an undivided Jerusalem.

New leader on the Bloc

Montreal MP Gilles Duceppe was elected the new leader of the Bloc Québécois last week. Duceppe won 52.8 percent of his party's support compared to his closest rival, former Quebec finance minister Yves Duhaime, who won just over one-third of the more than 50,000 votes cast.

Duceppe's leadership will likely prove "eventful" for his party. No sooner had he been declared the winner than Bloc MP Nic Leblanc resigned from the party to sit as an independent separatist. Nor could the runner-up, Duhaime, bring himself to utter even the perfunctory post-election platitudes towards his new leader. "I don't see why I should change my view tonight," he said, in answer to a reporter's inquiry about his widely-known negative feelings toward Duceppe.

As reported by the Globe and Mail, during the weekend convocation, the Bloc also debated its future parliamentary role after the next election. Duceppe was said to be among those members of the party who favor acting as the Official Opposition for all of Canada (our emphasis) if the Bloc retains that status after the next election. He need not bother. All of Canada expects and demands that a true Official Opposition must be loyal to and must serve Canada. No technical nominative quirk of our parliamentary system will ever change this, regardless of where the Bloc finishes in the election.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"A people can be helped only by its own efforts, and if it cannot help itself, it is beyond succour."

(From Herzl's opening address to the Congress)

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Purim 1862, Reuben Brainin was born. Brainin, editor of the Keneder Adler and of Der Veg, was a catalyst for the founding of the Montreal Jewish Public Library. (Canadian Jewish Congress Archives)

Where is the anger? I wish I knew

"Where is the anger over wartime atrocities?" In the 15 years I have been involved with the problem of alleged Nazi war criminals living in Canada, the question asked by Michael Lebovic in The CJN (Feb. 15), often rankled me. Why hasn't the enormity of the Nazi genocide of the Jews fastened itself more firmly onto the consciousness of the Canadian public? Why are so many of our judiciary still ignorant about the bestiality of the Holocaust? For that matter, why hasn't the abomination of many alleged perpetrators living peaceful, carefree lives in Canada had a higher priority in our own organized Jewish community? After all, almost everyone in our community had at least one known member of their extended family murdered in the Holocaust. (I am one of the few exceptions.)

In his bestselling book Hitler's Willing Executioners, Daniel Goldhagen describes the second mass killing of Jews perpetrated by German Police Battalion 101, in Lomazy, north-east of Lublin, Poland, in August 1942. Of the total population of 3,000, 1,700 were Jews. The round-up of Jews took two hours and proceeded with unspeakable cruelty. Those who could not make it on their own to the assembly point were shot on the spot. Those that were not killed in the fusillade at the round up spot were buried alive.

All of the murderers, the German soldiers and their Ukrainian auxilliaries, were volunteers. The commander of the battalion made clear to everyone that only those who volunteered would participate in the murders.

It is clear that at least 100,000 men and women participated directly in the murder of the six million Jews. We now know that many of these murderers found a post-war haven in Canada. If any of us didn't know before, Mike Wallace told us on 60 Minutes about Canada's sorry record after the war in welcoming Nazi war criminals as immigrants, but making it difficult for Jewish survivors to come to Canada.

Over the years, many Jewish leaders, including myself, have lobbied Canadian governments, political parties and the media as vigorously as possible to rectify this outrage to Canadian justice, and I am very proud of those efforts, especially the few times we were successful. All our lives we Jews have heard the foul canard recently mouthed by Michael Code, defence counsel for alleged war criminal Helmut Oberlander, that the current court actions are due to the "undue influence" of special interest groups.

The Michael Codes of this world should know that the days are long gone when our community could be intimidated into silence by thinly veiled public accusations that we possess superhuman powers of control over the society and are engaged in a collective conspiracy to undermine social values. Despite all attempts to frighten us off, we are determined to persist in our efforts until every war criminal living in Canada is brought before the bar of Canadian justice.

So, how to answer Lebovic's question, "Where is the anger over wartime atrocities?" I wish I had a satisfactory answer, but I don't.

Against appointment of Liberal candidate

As a 12-year resident of Thornhill, I do not agree with the appointment of any candidate in our area by the Liberal party. If a candidate cannot be recognized as a nominee by the residents of Thornhill, he/she should not be allowed to represent us. I also disagree with Bernie Green, who is "tooting his horn" with unproven claims about having the support of most of Jewish Thornhill. There are other capable candidates besides Green.

Murray Goldblatt was important journalist

Re: Jews have come long way in field of journalism (CJN, Feb. 20).

One of the most important Jewish journalists in recent Canadian history was my uncle, the late Murray Goldblatt. He worked as a reporter and editor for leading newspapers in both Ottawa and Toronto. In his capacity as a Carleton University journalism professor, he taught and inspired many of Canada's currently active reporters. His expertise was called upon by CBC Radio where he appeared frequently as a news analyst.

We regret we missed a typographical error in a letter from Rabbi Moshe Stern in the March 13 issue about brit milah (circumcision). It is a medical, not a radical, procedure.

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. Massacre at Naharayim

By DAVID RUDGE and DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Seven schoolgirls were killed and five pupils and a teacher wounded when a crazed Jordanian soldier shot them in cold blood as they toured the Jordanian-controlled Naharayim enclave in the Jordan Valley last week.

The seven victims — Sivan Fathi, Karen Cohen, Ya'ala Me'iri, Shiri Badayev, Natali Alkalai, Adi Malka and Nirit Cohen — were eighth graders at the AMIT Fuerst School in Beit Shemesh. They were all buried that same night. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Education Minister Zevulun Hammer attended the funerals.

Jordan's King Hussein said he expected to meet Netanyahu very shortly after the tragedy. Sources said they believed the monarch would come to Beit Shemesh to pay a condolence call to the victims' families.

At a press conference in Amman, King Hussein termed the tragedy "a slur on all of us. It's not political, it's a vile crime," he said.

It was "a day I never wanted to live to see," he said, and condemned the massacre as an attack against "his sons and daughters in his own home."

King Hussein expressed his condolences in a phone call to Netanyahu. Jordanian Prime Minister Abdel-Karim Kabariti also offered condolences to Netanyahu and called President Ezer Weizman.

Despite their current disagreements, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat called to offer his condolences.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who is currently in the United States, also sent a condolence letter to Netanyahu and U.S. President Bill Clinton called.

Earlier in the week, King Hussein had written a harsh letter to Netanyahu, questioning the prime minister's commitment to peace, and some cabinet ministers charged that the attack could not be completely divorced from the monarch's earlier comments to the premier.

"All verbal violence and threats of violence are immediately translated into actions," said Foreign Minister David Levy. "Jordan must take stock and monitor all those who have weapons. This psychological escalation could cause more catastrophes. Who knows how many crazies who carry weapons are waiting for the 'Green Light' [as they interpret them] statements made, characterizing Israel as it is characterized today."

The Jordanians have launched a full inquiry into the massacre, which occurred while the bus of schoolgirls was visiting the enclave that had been returned to Jordanian sovereignty under the terms of the peace accord with Israel.

The children had gotten off the bus after entering the enclave, passing through the Jordanian border post, where their ID cards were checked. One of the teaching assistants on the tour, Ya'acov Zecharya, said that they were standing at the observation post overlooking the site of the historic Rutenberg hydroelectric plant when the massacre occurred.

A soldier, reportedly a driver named Ahmed Moussa, 26, from Adasiya, a town near the site, took a colleague's rifle and climbed the observation tower above the site where the children were standing.

Zecharya said he saw the soldier climb down from the tower and come towards them. As he did this, he opened fire at the girls, who had their backs to him.

The soldier, eyewitnesses said, continued firing, apparently emptying one magazine before his second jammed. It was at that point that other Jordanian soldiers jumped on him and managed to subdue him.

Tour guide Raz Hess said he saw the gunman approach a girl who was still standing and fire at her from point-blank range, shooting her in the head.

A kindergarten teacher from nearby Kibbutz Ashdot Ya'acov witnessed the horror from a distance. She heard the first burst of gunfire, turned around as the second burst came and saw the children tumbling down the slope and screaming.

"It was terrible, just horrible," she said.

'Suddenly we heard a burst of fire...'

By DAVID RUDGE

JERUSALEM — Schoolteacher Rosa Himi described last week the events that brought a bloody and tragic end to the annual tour for seventh and eighth graders from the AMIT Fuerst school.

"We reached the Naharim enclave at 10:15 and were asked to hand over the weapons at the kibbutz and begin the tour with the guide, who was very nice," Himi said.

"We got out of the bus at the observation point and started to see the process of the pumps at the [former] Naharim electricity plant. In the middle of the description, suddenly we heard a burst of fire. I looked up and saw the Jordanian soldier firing from the observation tower.

"I shouted to the girls to go down the bank which was covered in mustard plants in bloom. The girls started to take cover as one burst came after another.

"The soldier saw that he was not succeeding, so he came after us to the edge [of the slope] and started firing at us from face-to-face distance. He had to change a magazine and when he did so, which didn't work, that was the end of it. It was a nightmare. I still can't take in what happened here.

"I started to call the girls who were around me and saw that some of them didn't answer me. I said to myself, 'What will happen until help comes?' I started to push them into the field and covered them until help came.

"Afterwards, I asked the children to get back on the bus. The Jordanian soldiers were by then prepared for what had happened. They came down but didn't allow us to touch our dead and wounded.

"We struggled with them and took several of the casualties onto the bus and the rest, they, [Jordanians] took them to Jordan." The surviving youngsters along with their teacher were taken to the clubhouse at nearby Kibbutz Gesher, where they were given first aid where necessary, food and drink, and telephones to call their anxious parents.

"They are hysterical. We didn't tell them all the truth. We told them that some are wounded and some of them would not be coming back to us," said Himi at the kibbutz before leaving to continue the process of identifying the youngsters killed in the massacre.

The day after seven of their classmates were killed at Naharayim, these schoolgirls comfort each other at the candle-light memorial set up in their school. [Reuters/RNS]

An island symbol of peace

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jordan's King Hussein, in a June 1995 meeting at Naharayim with Yitzhak Rabin and Helmut Kohl, said that "No place better illustrates the fact that we are at peace" than Naharayim.

Until last week.

Indeed, the island where the Yarmuk and Jordan rivers meet, has — until now — been a symbol of the peace treaty between Jordan and Israel. A sign at the entrance to the island, located 10 kilometres south of the Kinneret, reads Island of Peace.

Under the 1994 accord, the Hashemite kingdom regained sovereignty over the area, but Israel leased the land for 25 years with an option to renew. Kibbutz Ashdot Ya'acov Meuhad and Kibbutz Ashdot Ya'acov Ihud, which have fields and orchards on the island, continue to cultivate them.

The peace treaty stipulates that although Jordan has complete control of the island, Israelis can enter the area, for a fee, without visas or passports. Entrance is through a Jordanian checkpoint.

Tens of thousands of Israelis have taken advantage of this as a way to "go to Jordan" for a few hours. In addition, thousands of Palestinians and Israeli Arabs go there on the weekends to meet relatives from Jordan, and even some who filter down from Syria. At the end of the day, everyone goes back home: The site is not a transit point between Israel and Jordan.

Holocaust ruptured three histories

The following is an excerpt from my inaugural lecture in occupancy of the Franz Rosenzweig Chair at the University of Kassel, the city of Rosenzweig's birth, for the summer semester 1997. In a following letter I hope to explain my thoughts about accepting that invitation.

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

Since Hitler lost the war, the "final solution" has remained incomplete, but at least three histories are ruptured by an abyss, the German, the Jewish, the Christian. Or Europe's as well? So it seems, after what is coming to light now.

Where in world history, i.e., including the German, was ever an attempt made to murder every single member of a human group, as if they were vermin, of which not one must be left alive, while at the same time it was subjected to calumnies and torture, as if they were devils? Even as horrendous a concept as genocide must still be distinguished from extermination, and if one is really bent on the idea that this human group is vermin, that is, behave like vermin because they can't help it, it is in their race, the calumnies and tortures are still unexplained: you get rid of vermin, but you don't insult and torture them. To be sure, Hitler said that he was merciful to the Jews, for he had killed them without unnecessary torture. That's what he said, but not what he did.

If one really wants to explain both these aspects — the vermin and the devil — it is probably possible only through ideology, more precisely Weltanschauung. Indeed, in Mein Kampf, Hitler wrote that the conflict between the Jews and mankind was cosmic, and that in case the Jews won, the world would be lifeless for thousands of years, and in a footnote he even improved on this by substituting "millions." (A mere ideology is not cosmic.)

Was he insane? Then how did he become fuehrer? Were the little Hitlers who acted also insane? Raul Hilberg has said that he has always confined himself to small questions — the trains, the paper pushing killers, in short, how they did it — for fear of too small an answer to the big question... Why? Insanity — of one, of some, of all — is too small an answer for the big question. Much too small.

A German historian, Joachim Fest, says that Hitler was a "metaphysician." That is no small answer, but it is, to say the least, doubtful.

So it is with German history: How with the Jewish? Where were Jews ever not only defined by enemies through birth, but also persecuted on account of it? But in the Holocaust Jews were systematically robbed of freedom even in extremis, on the one hand, of heroism, death by fighting, on the other hand, of martyrdom, death of having a choice in it.

The Roman Emperor Hadrian, the worst enemy of the Jews until he was surpassed by Hitler, forbade the Jewish religion on pain of death, and thus created Jewish martyrs, 10 of whom are remembered in Judaism to this day, and who help strengthen the faith to this day. (They are remembered on Yom Kippur, the holiest day in Judaism.)

Hitler not only murdered Jews, but with them, also Jewish martyrdom.

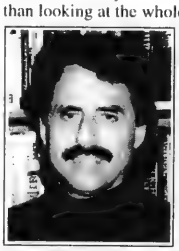
And Christian history? The so-called "myth of the 19th century" was essentially the doctrine of an "Aryan" Christ, a basically German affair. Whether this is really over, by Christians or Germans, I am not sure, for while the world is now generally anti-"Aryan," to be anti-"Aryan" is not necessarily to be pro-Jewish.

But even prior to this aberration, the fact is that even the Christianity of the Jew Jesus was widely hostile to his people, and this for centuries. In my view, this was a tragedy of world-historical significance, for with Christian hatred against Jews hatred got into the religion of love.

Even so, however, the Holocaust is an in principle, new challenge in Christian history. So long as anti-Semitism is only against some Jews — the old anti-Semitism: they are stubborn, they won't convert; the new one: they are money-lovers, unpatriotic, even conspirators — there can always be good Jews beside the bad ones, in an emergency, at least One. But if the aim is a world entirely judenrein, without exception on account of birth, then the carpenter of Nazareth is one of them a Jew, too.

Myopia obscures burning issues

Being shortsighted has its benefits. You can see clearly only a few feet in front of you. Sometimes it is easier than looking at the whole picture.



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

Myopia is very popular here in Israel. If you open the local newspapers or watch local television news or listen to the politicians, you would believe the only burning issues in the Jewish State are the latest clashes, casualty figures and political crises in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Israelis have found a bizarre reassurance in almost exclusively focusing on this unending saga, not only because of its objective size, but also because such myopia eases the burden of looking at some of the serious, very serious, internal problems facing this country.

Case in point: Last month, 73 Israeli soldiers were killed in a tragic helicopter accident. It was truly a national disaster. The automatic reflexes went into action. There was a day of mourning; there were special lessons in school; there were heartwrenching profiles of those who had died on television. Every funeral was announced. Many were broadcast on the local news.

Israel must hold the world record for annual national days of mourning — Remembrance Day, Holocaust Day and unfortunately numerous days following large-scale bloodshed. Are so many days of sadness necessary?

Of course we must remember the dead. Of course we must remember the sacrifice. But take a careful look at the national dynamic, when there is such a day — and that is the bizarre pay off.

Israel's national dynamic

People are reassured. They are reassured in a national unity; they are reassured in the sad predictability of this conflict. There are seemingly clear rights and wrongs; there are seemingly clear values. The world is firm on national days of mourning.

You might ask, "So what's wrong with this?" The problem is that the real issues that don't have clear cut answers are ignored in the blur of national myopia.

For example, every month more than 20 Israelis are killed in road accidents. The biggest killer in this country by far is not Arab terror. It is the Israeli driver. Hezbollah manages to kill fewer Israelis in a whole year than the highways claim in just over two months.

The children, the innocent pedestrians, the elderly who can't move quickly, these victims of Israeli highway terror only make the inside pages.

There are no national days of mourning. There are no profiles of these tragic victims. There are no broadcast funerals portraying the terrible grief of a mother who lost her whole family in a road accident. Why? Are the roadside victims' lives cheaper? Were their lives not brutally cut off? The answer lies in national myopia.

This is a very aggressive society. Israelis consider themselves "suckers" if they cooperate with each other rather than fight. It is evident in business, it is evident in Parliament and it is bloody evident on the roads.

Instead of really and truly examining the problem, it is easier to rally to the flag and to hide behind the painful sacrifice for the Jewish State.

The same rule holds true for the disastrous state of education and hospitals, or in the very hostile relations between religious and non-religious, or in the serious drug problem, or in the gap between rich and poor.

We have to stop insulting those who have fallen for this country by hiding behind their sacrifice. They would want those they have been left in this world to use their legacy to face the problems of this state and transform it into a better society.

Archives reveal schnorr letters

Several months ago, I wrote a column about my old teacher, Prof. Jacob R. Marcus, the pre-eminent historian of American Jewry. I had received a booklet of his famous schnorr letters, written on behalf of American Jewish Archives, the prime repository for American Jewish historical materials. I could not resist quoting a sample of Marcus' gems. The response to my article was wonderful and encouraged me to print another letter, written in 1995:

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"As you know, if I have luck I will become 100 years of age soon. When Abraham was 100 he fathered Isaac. Believe me, I have no such ambitions.

"People do ask me how I account for my longevity, such as it is. The secret is that I never smoked, drank or ran around with girls until I was 12 years of age. I am kind to women, children, worms. I speak of God in the highest terms.

"In other words, I am an Anglo-Saxon Hebrew, a Reform Jew who believes in the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man and the neighborhood of Cincinnati. I learned to discipline myself. The only fiction I now read is my own historical writings. I am alert and find it easy to remember many things that never happened.

"I am very proud of the history of the American Jew. Despite the fact that we are only about 2.5 percent of the population, we have a remarkable record. We are found in the White House assisting the president; there are several Jews in the presidential cabinet; Jews are found on the Supreme Court; they are numerous in Congress; they have distinguished themselves in science.

"How would you account for what the Jew has accomplished here in this country? I find it very difficult to explain. I don't know the answer.

"One might say it is because the Jews devote themselves to education; they go to school and apply themselves in every sense of the term. This may, or may not, explain why we achieve what we do.

"I do not believe — although I know very little of these things — that Jews were born superior. I believe that one advances through hard work, through learning and through application. The Jew has always been challenged to be somebody and on the whole he has responded. That in part explains why he is what he is today. Despite the fact that Jews are a minuscule part of American life they have had a profound influence upon it.

"As an American Jewish historian, the question has often been put to me: What books have helped you? The answer is obvious; my mother's cookbook and your chequebook.

"P.S. God willing, I hope to be 100 years of age in a few months. I hope you will respond to the Archives. Over the years, you have been very good to us."

Unfortunately, Marcus was not permitted to become a centenarian. But, for all his disciples, he remains as alive as if he were with us in the flesh.

Strands of German history converge in Weimar

By Sheldon Kirshner

The confounding, contradictory strands of German history converge in Weimar, a pleasant town in the eastern state of Thuringia.

Weimar is the home of some of Germany's greatest literary and musical figures and the birthplace of the short-lived Weimar Republic, a paradigm of democracy.

Yet Weimar bears several crosses. It was the site of the Nazi party's first national congress. It was the abode of Fritz Saukel, the gauleiter (district leader) of the Nazi party in Thuringia, the first German state in which a Nazi official achieved ministerial power. And Weimar had a disturbing relationship with a notorious concentration camp, Buchenwald, which is only eight kilometres away, high in the wind-swept Ettersberg hills.

Weimar, then, has a schizophrenic and tortuous soul, torn as it is between the polar opposites of modern Germany.

Late last year, I visited Weimar and Buchenwald as a guest of the German National Tourism Office and Lufthansa Airlines, both of which have launched a campaign to encourage Jewish travellers to see the new, reunified Germany, the Germany which emerged from the ashes of the Third Reich.

On a cloudy day in November, I began my visit of Weimar with a tour of a special exhibit in the State Museum called In the Footsteps of Jewish Life in Weimar, 1770-1945.

Before the tour got under way, I asked the guide to explain the purpose of the exhibition, which closed three weeks later after a lengthy run.

I was told that it was mounted for the edification of the present generation, which has little or no knowledge of the historic Jewish presence in Thuringia. This is not surprising. Until 1990, Weimar was part of East Germany, a Communist state which did practically nothing to foster the continuity of its minuscule and moribund Jewish community.

Jews arrived in Thuringia in the 10th century and in Weimar - the capital of the state - four centuries later. The Jewish burghers of medieval Weimar did not enjoy equal civic rights and were subjected to mob violence and expulsions, as elsewhere in Germany and the rest of Europe.

On the eve of Adolf Hitler's appointment as chancellor in 1933, the Jewish population of Weimar was modest, less than 100. There was no synagogue and not much of an organized Jewish life. Indeed, Weimar Jews were affiliated with the Jewish community in neighboring Erfurt.

The advent of the Third Reich spelled finis to Jewish existence in Weimar, which, under Saukel's influence, became a centre of Aryan racial research and anti-Semitic agitation. Hitler was a frequent visitor, and when he was in town, he stayed at the Hotel Elephant, which is still one of the best hotels in the region.

In the wake of Kristallnacht, scores of Weimar Jews were interned in Buchenwald, and only released when they agreed to emigrate. Jews unable or unwilling to leave were dispatched to Auschwitz and Treblinka in May 1942. They shared the fate of Thuringian Jews from towns like Eisenberg, Jena and Gotha.

A handful of Jewish survivors returned after the war, frustrating Saukel's grandiose goal of rendering Weimar Judenrein. Saukel himself, having been declared a war criminal, was hanged in 1946, following a celebrated trial in Nuremberg. Today, an estimated 10 Jews live in Weimar, a town of about 60,000 lying along the banks of the Ilm River.

Despite its size, Weimar has a distinguished pedigree. The Saxon countess Anna Amalia, an exceedingly wise woman, invited the poets Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Friedrich Schiller to Weimar, where they flourished. The composers Johann Sebastian Bach, Carl Maria von Weber and Franz Liszt were also drawn to its hospitality. Their respective homes have been renovated and turned into popular museums.

Weimar, as well, is inextricably linked with the 16th century painter Lucas Cranach the Elder. His half-timbered, fairy tale house rounds off an exquisite ensemble of renovated Renaissance buildings in the central square, the Marktplatz, one of the prettiest in Europe.

Walter Gropius founded the Bauhaus movement of architecture here in 1919, the year the ill-fated Weimar Republic was proclaimed by the German National Assembly in the National Theatre. The statues of Goethe and Schiller stand shoulder to shoulder in front of the gray building where German democracy, born in a flush of optimism, was swiftly snuffed out just 13 years later by a cruel, megalomanical regime.

The twisted face of Nazism reveals itself in Buchenwald, which was established in 1937 as a camp for political opponents, religious dissenters, common criminals, social misfits and homosexuals. During the war, Allied soldiers - including Soviets and Canadians-passed through Buchenwald. Jews were initially brought here in 1938, in the aftermath of Kristallnacht. The majority were set free after promising to sell their properties and leave Germany and Austria (which Hitler had annexed).

Former Nazi bastion lies near Buchenwald

Buchenwald, which was converted into an anti-fascist museum and a memorial by East Germany, sprawls over four square kilometres, running into densely wooded valleys where prisoners' huts once stood. From these green hills, 470 metres above sea level, you can see the outlines of Weimar and the plain upon which it sits.

Buchenwald, guarded by the SS, was a work camp, funnelling inmates from more than 30 countries into armament factories on the grounds and in Weimar. The older residents of Weimar thus cannot claim that they were unaware of Buchenwald.

Buchenwald had no gas chambers, but crematoriums, manufactured in Erfurt by Topf & Sohne, were installed in 1940 to dispose of thousands of prisoners who had been shot or who had succumbed to disease and gruesome medical experiments.

All in all, Buchenwald consumed 55,000 people, approximately 11,000 of whom were Jews.

It was liberated by the U.S. army in April 1945. But after the war, the Soviet Union controlled it, using it as a labor camp for Nazis.

Virtually all its buildings, from the barracks to the munition plants, are long gone. The factories were bombed in 1944 by the U.S. and British air forces. The barracks were dismantled in the 1950s to cope with a scarcity of residential housing. The crematoriums are still intact, a particularly chilling reminder of the depths to which Germany sank under Nazism.

There are two Jewish monuments. The first, which takes the form of a simple stone marker, was erected by the Communists. It is inscribed in German, Hebrew and Russian. The second, which was built recently, is in the shape of a rectangular stone quarry.

One final note. My guide in Buchenwald, which evokes a terrible sense of bleakness, was Daniel Gaede, a Hebrew-speaking German who lost an eye in a terrorist incident near Jericho eight years ago. He, too, carries the scars of hatred.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

The Five Books of Moses* translated by Everett Fox (Random House, $70).

The Stone Edition Of The Tanach* edited by Nosson Scherman (Mesorah Publications (no price indicated)).

The earliest translation of the Hebrew Bible was into Greek in the early third century BCE. According to tradition, this work was undertaken in Alexandria, Egypt, by 72 elders from 12 tribes. The number was eventually rounded off to 70, from which we derive the Greek term for the translation, "Septuagint" — usually indicated as LXX.

This translation served the educational and liturgical needs of the large Greek speaking Jewish diaspora.

The Targums were rendering of the books of the Hebrew Bible into Aramaic. These translations probably go back to the second Temple period when Jews living in Palestine and elsewhere in the Near East were no longer familiar with their ancestral tongue.

The renderings of the Bible into English were often a source of danger to the translators. The first complete translation is credited to John Wycliffe (1330-1384). For 150 years, this was the only Bible in English. In 1415, however, his work was condemned and his body exhumed and burned.

William Tyndale published his translation of the Pentateuch in 1531. In 1536, he was found guilty of heresy, strangled and burned at the stake. His last words were reputed to be, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes!"

The Bible translated during the reign of James VI of Scotland by 54 "learned men" was published in 1611. This work, and its revisions over the years, became the most widely read and revered of all English versions.

In the United States, the earliest translation of the Hebrew Bible was done by Isaac Leeser (1854); it became the accepted version in all synagogues in the United States. Under sponsorship of the Jewish Publication Society (JPS) of America, a group of scholars produced a new translation (1917), which became the standard Bible of the American Jewish community, until the appearance of what is known as the New Jewish Version by the JPS published under the title, Tanach, in one volume in 1985.

Today, in English alone the Bible can be found in at least 40 translations and is a household icon in nine out of 10 American homes.

Everett Fox is professor of Jewish Studies at Clark College in Worcester, Mass. The aim of his translation is to draw the reader into the Hebrew Bible through the power of its language. He concentrates on echoing the style of the original through rhythms and sounds and verbal patterns. All five books are put in verse form that helps to capture the musical and poetic flow of the original.

For his inspiration, Fox, who spent 25 years on this work, went to the pioneering German translation of Martin Buber and Franz Rosenzweig. They were eager to have their translation read aloud — as is Fox — which, of course, is how the Jewish community hears the Torah in the synagogue.

The volume has an insightful and helpful running commentary by Fox, as well as introductions and notes.

The Stone Edition of the 24 books of the Hebrew Bible is intended especially for the Orthodox community. The brief commentary, drawn largely from Rashi, the Talmud and rabbinic literature, constitutes an invaluable anthology of traditional sources.

The translation, edited by Rabbi Nosson Scherman and a group of contributing scholars, shows little advantage over the JPS version. But, this mammoth volume of 2,050 pages contains an innovative group of timelines, charts, maps, a translation of names in the Hebrew Bible and an index of themes and personalities.

Both of these works of scholarship — meant for the general reader — are indicative of the increased interest in Jewish learning and knowledge in our time.

Pilgrimages to Israel

As the month of March nears its end and April approaches, the number of people travelling to Israel will increase in preparation for the spring holidays. Each year at Passover and Easter, Jews and Christians travel to Israel in large numbers to mark these traditional holidays, be it in Jerusalem, Nazareth, Bethlehem or the Galilee. Israel is acknowledged worldwide as the centre of religious consciousness.

Indeed, 30 to 40 percent of tourism to Israel is pilgrimage-based. For our purposes, a pilgrim is defined broadly as an individual visiting Israel out of fundamentally religious motivation. The pilgrimage market is important for the Israeli tourist industry; it is, according to the Ministry of Tourism, a loyal market, much less affected by the political environment than other tourists since there is no substitute for the religious sites of Israel in general and Jerusalem in particular.

For all three of the major monotheistic religions, Jerusalem figures as a place of great importance. In biblical times, Jews fulfilled the religious injunction to make offerings at the Temple on three feast days. It was the Pesach pilgrimage that brought Jesus to Jerusalem; and although the primary Muslim pilgrimages are to the holy sites of Mecca and Medina, Mohammed's night ride to heaven in order to receive the Koran is said to have begun at the Temple Mount, and Jerusalem is thus a revered holy city.

For Jews, Passover is one of the most popular times of the year to visit Israel. Passover is one of the three pilgrim festivals (along with Shavuot and Sukkot) when Jews were commanded to make the pilgrimage to the Temple in Jerusalem (Ex. 23:14). Indeed, the special pull to visit Israel during Passover is reflected in two of the holiday's four names — the Season of our Freedom (Zman Cheruteinu) and the Festival of Spring (Chag ha-Aviv). Passover has special significance for Jews as the celebration of the freedom from bondage in Egypt and the return to the Land of Israel.

Since the second century CE, Christian pilgrims have set out on long and difficult voyages crossing deserts and oceans to visit the holy sites of the "Terra Sancta," to set foot in Jerusalem, Nazareth and Bethlehem. Today, travel to Israel is obviously much easier and faster — the donkey has been traded in for the airplane.

As this column is geared toward the Jewish public, it may be of interest to note some of the sites in Jerusalem that Christian pilgrims tend to flock to, among them Ein Kerem, the Mount of Olives, the gardens and grotto of Gethsemane, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Via Dolorosa, the site of the Last Supper and the Garden Tomb.

Since the reunification of Jerusalem in 1967, there has been an enormous amount of archeological activity, more than ever before in the city's history. During the course of the 1970s, vast excavations were conducted at the Southern Wall of the Temple Mount, the Jewish Quarter of the Old City and the City of David.

Shifting now from the spiritual to the more mundane, Passover and Easter usually fall during the month of April — springtime in Israel. According to all accounts, pilgrimage visits no longer focus exclusively on the holy sites of the country. Everyone is attracted by the beauty and dynamism of modern Israel as well. The weather during this period is warm and sunny but not yet too hot. The flowers are in full bloom; it is undoubtedly the most beautiful time of the year to visit the country.

Purim, the Gulf War and a volunteer in Israel

By DONIA BLUMENFELD CLENMAN
Special to The CJN

What shall I say about Purim, this holiday for young and old, the best known, the most celebrated, the most public of all holidays?

What words shall I, a Canadian volunteer at Camp Naftali, use, in order not to darken the festive spirit of this soldiers' party and the contributions of the volunteers who worked with such fervor to make it a success? Just a few brief reflections. For strangely, this most extravagant holiday is also the most elusive and many-layered tale; parables, marvels and deja vu almost drowned by masks, parades and partying.

In a certain way, the scroll of Esther has the form of a fairy tale. "Once Upon a Time"...the lush opulent East, a palace, an oriental potentate, an evil vizier, a beautiful maiden, a queen — nay two queens — and the essential struggle between good and evil. Except that "Once Upon a Time" has a definite locale. Shushan is Persia, the time is the first exile and the succession of Babylon, Assyria and Medes-Persia; Mordecai is a Jew and the beautiful maiden is Esther, a Jewish girl whose Hebrew name is Hadassah.

It is also an unusual Jewish holiday, for normative Judaism advocates restraint and, while not making a virtue of poverty, in its wisdom, it tries to curb the excesses of human passions. Yet this is the one holiday that advocates excess. Ad lo yadah (Till you don't know the difference), eating, merrymaking, indulging to the point of drunkenness, excess glorified.

Why? This is not a simple Dionysian release, a Bacchanalian orgy, for Judaism has a different philosophical outlook on the channelling of human eroticism. True, it is a celebration of victory, but there were other victories in our history, and appropriate celebrations.

How is this one different? A Passover kushiyah (question)?

My friend, Dov Noy, professor of folklore and literature at Hebrew University, told me of the extraordinary impression the celebration of Purim made on him when he observed Purim customs among Oriental Jews in Islamic countries. Such joy, such passion, such rejoicing were possible only in a people who knew total helplessness. Always dependent on the good graces of others, living in perpetual state of fear and subjugation, here perpetual victims suddenly turned victors. A sense of power unknown to the weak.

It is obvious from the story that this was not a question of war, of equal adversaries, of territorial or political claims. No, Haman's reasons for annihilation are: "O King, there is a certain people in your kingdom who are different from all others," mere existence the reason for total destruction.

Two millennia later, we heard the same words, "There is a certain people..." restated by Hitler, and then came the ensuing extermination of European Jewry.

Achashverosh is not an evil man, only an indifferent one, and yet, he and his courtiers led by Haman are not so different from the Holocaust bystanders. For when evil is not checked, seemingly good people become accessories and partners to murder.

Scanning history from misty BCE and the first exile to World War II and the Holocaust brings me to the present Haman called Saddam, the Gulf War, our volunteering, the Scuds falling on an Israel forbidden to defend itself and finding it necessary to comply, masked faces in sealed rooms.

And if we rejoice in the courage of one Jew, Mordecai, and one young woman, Hadassah (Esther), and every year party and party, how much more do I rejoice to be today in my country, Israel, among my people, defenders of a Jewish State which stands on guard for us, a haven for all Jews — Russian, Ethiopian, Yemenite, Iraqi, Moroccan, Polish, French — all who were, are, might be threatened and persecuted?

Today, I, born in Poland, who knew Haman and the face of evil in Europe, for whom any army was always an enemy, so that it took me years in Canada to overcome a fear of a friendly policeman, am joined to my brothers and sisters from all corners of the world. At Camp Naftali, an army base, surrounded by Jewish soldiers, myself wearing a soldier's uniform and, Scuds or no Scuds, lack of sleep and dark dark memories, I feel protected, guarded, defended and as straight and proud as I have never felt in my life.

A toast, l'chayim, to life, the destruction of all Hamans, the genius of our people and the Third Commonwealth, and the passionate merrymaking at Purim.

Branson president explores hospital's future

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An easy to reach out-patient service for elderly people in the area, possibly in Branson Hospital itself, is an absolute necessity when the hospital is closed in about two years, Branson's president says.

"It's unthinkable that this community will be abandoned," said Jack Gallop.

In concert with North York General Hospital, Gallop said, such a recommendation will be made to the Health Services Restructuring Commission in the appeal period, which ends April 12.

Other options for use of the Branson building will be presented to the commission, but they are still under discussion, he said.

One issue still to be settled is whether a state-of-the-art $2.7-million scanning machine, paid for by donors, will go to North York General or York Finch.

"We would like to keep it here at Branson for use in the community," said Gallop.

If doctors have to affiliate with other hospitals and move out of Branson, it will leave a big gap in medical services available and this is causing much concern, he added.

Meanwhile, an official at the newly-named Humber River Regional Hospital (formerly York Finch/Northwestern/Humber Memorial) said it will welcome new patients when Branson closes.

Located at Finch Avenue and highway 400, Humber River is destined to receive 60 percent of Branson's medical and emergency patients, 50 percent of its surgery and 20 percent of its obstetrics.

"We appreciate that there may be a lack of information in the community about our hospital," said Greg Gaudet.

For one thing, the hospital complies with any requests from patients for kosher meals, he said.

This is also true of North York General, marked for 70 percent of Branson's obstetrics, 50 percent of surgery, 30 percent of medical, 30 percent of emergency and 100 percent of pediatrics.

Kosher meals are also available at York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill, according to president Frank Lussing. The commission said York Central would get 10 percent of Branson's obstetrics, medical and emergency patients.

A new nursing care building is likely to be built at York Central because of the region's rapid growth.

The Humber River Hospital expects affiliation requests from Branson doctors and each case will be considered, Gaudet said. Since changes are not going to happen right away, "it's business as usual," he said.

In its report ordering closing of Branson, the commission said that hospital had the smallest volume of patients in the area. By contrast, it described the York-Finch area as a "high need" population and said that hospital has a surplus capacity.

The catchment areas of North York General and York-Finch overlap that of Branson, the report said.

Crown attorney briefed on fighting racism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In Scarborough recently, an Asian man was the victim of a crime that police investigated and brought to trial. Although the perpetrator was convicted, the Crown attorney was unaware that the perpetrator had links to extremist groups and that racism may have been a motivation in the attack.

Under current Canadian law, racism may be taken into account as an aggravating factor when the trial judge considers sentence.

That incident, and the lighter penalty handed to the perpetrator, prompted Crown attorney John McMahon to do something so that such cases don't continue to "fall between the cracks."

McMahon contacted Canadian Jewish Congress and arranged a special 1½-hour presentation on racist groups. About 25 Scarborough Crown attorneys took part in the recent seminar conducted by Bernie Farber and Steven Shulman, director and associate director of Congress' community relations committee, along with Sgt. Dino Doria of the Metro Police anti-hate unit.

Congress, which had a file on the perpetrator of the attack, could have served as a resource for police and Crown attorneys in the case, McMahon said. Congress' activity monitoring extremist groups took the Crown lawyers a little by surprise, Shulman said. Congress provided them with copies of From Marches to Modems, an analysis of modern hate groups. Both sides agreed to keep open the lines of communication.

Looking to organizations like Congress could serve as a model in consulting with other community groups, McMahon said. "Any information from any source could be quite helpful."

Although hate-motivated crime in Scarborough doesn't represent a large percentage of infractions, "we take this seriously and one is too many," he said.

Germany urged to identify SS vets receiving pensions

TORONTO — The head of the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC) is calling on the German government to reveal the names of 1,882 SS veterans living in Canada who are receiving German disabilities pensions.

Pointing to the prosecution in Italy of former major Karl Haas, Sol Littman said the case shows the alleged Nazi war criminal has been receiving a German government pension of $560 (US) a month, despite allegations against him that date back to 1944. Haas is to stand trial for his alleged role in the 1944 Ardeatine Cave Massacre in which 335 Italian men and boys were shot in retaliation for a partisan attack on a German convoy. Seventy-five of the victims were Jews.

"The Haas case clearly indicates that the German government's claim that none of the pensioners could possibly be war criminals because war criminals are not eligible for pensions according to German law, is the worst kind of circular reasoning," Littman stated.

The SWC accuses the German government of failing to investigate records of former SS men receiving pensions and of refusing to turn over the addresses of wanted war criminals.

In a letter to German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel, Rabbi Marvin Hier and Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Centre's Los Angeles headquarters suggested the information about Haas "destroys the credibility of any claim that the list of pensioners was ever checked for criminal behavior.

"That the former SS criminals living in Europe, Canada and the United States are still recipients of such funds indicates that their whereabouts were known to your government and that no serious effort to analyze the virtual Rosetta Stone of Nazi war criminals was ever considered by the Federal Republic [of Germany]," the letter states.

The Wiesenthal Centre demanded that all SS pensions be suspended; that lists of SS pensioners be made available to governments and organizations that search for Nazi war criminals; and that an immediate investigation be launched to determine whether other notorious war criminals like Josef Schwammberger, Erich Priebke, Adolf Eichmann, Josef Mengele and Klaus Barbie ever received German government pensions.

'It was very dark outside, with not even the moon to give us light, when the Molotov Cocktail hit the centre of the Jeep; the bottle shattered all over us and started to burn us. I was trapped in the back seat, burning like a living torch. Everything was burning. I managed to get out of the jeep. I had burns all over my body. I was hospitalized for 10 months and had countless plastic surgery operations. Through it all, my wife, children, parents and friends were by my side.

I had to stay in bed for six months. During this time I was introduced to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. I initially visited the Centre for physiotherapy and then learned there were many more activities. Beit Halochem becAme my second home. Everyone made me feel very comfortable because everyone was in the same boat. I felt protected and cared for. I have no doubt that Beit Halochem helped me in the best way possible. There were times when they actually helped me forget my dreadful injuries.

From the bottom of my heart, I want to thank those who thought of the idea of establishing a place like Beit Halochem, for those of us who have suffered injuries and are now disabled. I want to thank those who manage it, and those who contribute to it with such generosity.'

Caplan appointment stirs controversy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — The appointment of Elinor Caplan by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien as the Liberal candidate in the riding of Thornhill has stirred some controversy.

Disappointment with Chrétien's decision lies mainly with "the potential candidates" in Thornhill, Caplan told The CJN.

"The truth is, they were all told that because this is a new riding, a candidate might be designated," she said.

Besides, she added, the party voted overwhelmingly in 1992 to change nomination rules to allow the leader to appoint a candidate in any riding.

"This is wholly and strictly an internal matter," said the Oriole MPP who was named the Liberal hopeful in Thornhill, following weeks of rumors that Chrétien was seeking high-profile women to run in the next election.

"The leader has his reasons," said Caplan. "We must accept his decision."

She was quoted last week as saying she supports Chrétien's decision to appoint women as candidates. "Women are socialized to wait to be asked," Caplan stated. "[It is] important to have an initiative such as this from the prime minister. It changes the dynamic."

Longtime Vaughan city councillors Bernie Green and Mario Racco, who were both seeking the Liberal nod in the riding, expressed bitterness at Caplan's appointment.

"I don't know which is worse, this or losing," Green told The CJN. "It's very disappointing."

Green, who claims to have sewn up support from major Jewish organizations and synagogues in the riding, says he spent thousands of supporters' dollars on his "full-scale" campaign.

"But that's really irrelevant. Hundreds of people joined the political process, and now that's been snatched from their hands," he said.

Green said he's still a loyal Liberal, but criticized Chrétien's move. "He should have shown greater sensitivity to a new riding. I don't think it's a right approach for women. I think women can stand on their own two feet."

Racco stopped short of endorsing the riding's Conservative candidate, Bill Fisch, in the next election, but said, "Anyone who is appointed must be defeated."

Caplan's appointment is "a slap in the face of democracy. It never should have happened," he said.

"I don't see how [Caplan] has a chance to win. The only beneficiary is Bill Fisch. We've lost this riding."

For her part, Caplan said Racco "would have accepted an appointment."

And she defended not living in the riding, saying she "probably knows as many people" in Thornhill as in Oriole.

"Oriole and Thornhill have a lot in common. They both have large multicultural populations and Jewish communities.

"For me, in a way, it's like coming home."

Former Liberal hopeful Doron Aronson supported Chretien's decision. "It's disappointing but we have to respect the leader and look at the larger picture, which is unity," said Aronson, who said he gathered about 1,000 signatures of support for his campaign.

Also last week, Metro Councillor Norman Gardner announced he will seek the Conservative nomination in the federal riding of Willowdale.

Gardner is a member of B'nai Brith, the Jewish war Veterans of Canada and Beth Tikvah synagogue. He has also held various civic positions.

The riding is currently held by Liberal MP Jim Peterson.

Hate crimes down

TORONTO — The incidence of hate crimes reported to Metro police plummeted by 43 percent in 1996, according to statistics compiled by the Metro police intelligence unit.

The total number of incidents reported to police in 1996 fell to 175, considerably fewer than the 302 hate crimes reported in 1995. Police attributed the drop to several factors, including an effective outreach program to high school students to warn them of the dangers of racism and to the under-reporting of incidents.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber suggested also that organized racist groups like the Heritage Front are experiencing a leadership vacuum, contributing to the decline in incidents.

Blacks, Asians, Jews and gays were the groups most often targeted for hate crimes, says the report, presented to the Metro Police Services Board.

Assaults were the most common hate crime and the majority of perpetrators were found to be males between the ages of 12 and 25.

Those suspects found to be affiliated with organized groups were most often linked to the Heritage Front and Polish Skinheads, the report stated.

CHRC head fighting for equality for women

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over one-fifth of the 1,200 complaints received by the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) last year dealt with sex discrimination. Many of them were sexual harassment cases.

"We still have a lot of work to do here in Canada before women achieve full equality," said Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, chief commissioner of the CHRC, "but at least we are out of the dark ages."

Montreal-born Falardeau-Ramsay, a lawyer who was CHRC deputy commissioner for eight years before being appointed to her current position in January, was speaking recently to commemorate International Women's Day (March 8) at the B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) building on Hove Street. The event was co-sponsored by the Canadian Human Rights Commission and Women in Interfaith Dialogue of BBC's League for Human Rights.

On a global scale and even in Canada, women's rights have not automatically been included under the umbrella of human rights, said Falardeau-Ramsay.

In French-speaking countries "with the notable exception of Canada," human rights are referred to as Les Droits de l'Homme (men's rights), she said.

Both in this talk and at a recent Ottawa meeting with a delegation of Canadian Jewish Congress, Falardeau-Ramsay indicated that issues relating to the status of women would be among her priorities as chief commissioner.

The biggest difference between Canada and other parts of the world in terms of women's rights Falardeau-Ramsay believes, is that "we are just a little ahead in the pursuit of women's equality. Many of us remember a time when open and overt sex discrimination was not only acceptable but legally sanctioned."

Newspaper ads, for example, used to have two categories under Help Wanted: male and female.

Falardeau-Ramsay herself took only three weeks off work, at her own expense, when her son was born — before the days of six-month maternity leaves. "It's not that long ago, because I'm not a dinosaur," she quipped.

Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay

It was only in 1994 that the United Nations commission on human rights appointed a special reporter to investigate systemic violence against women. That change can be attributed to the efforts of women's organizations, Falardeau-Ramsay said.

There is a growing recognition worldwide that "violation of women's rights, whether social and economic inequality, access to education, female genital mutilation, or domestic violence and rape, is as serious as unlawful detention.

Universal rights

"At the level of individual countries... decision makers can no longer look at issues like domestic violence and say, 'That's just a women's issue;' nor can countries continue to hide behind culture as an excuse for violating the rights of women. If human rights are universal, so are women's rights."

Challenges we still face in Canada include child poverty, Falardeau-Ramsay said. "If we are to do something for child poverty, equality for women has to be part of that equation."

Canadian women working full time still earn only 73 cents for every dollar earned by men, she noted. Although more women are entering management-level jobs, the majority are still concentrated in clerical and service positions.

"Let us all hope that one day we won't have to talk about whether women's rights are human rights because it will be something we can all take for granted."

Other participants in the program included Rochelle Wilner and Karen Mock, national chair and national director respectively, League for Human Rights; Mervin Witter, Ontario regional director, CHRC; Beth Porter of Women in Interfaith Dialogue; and Talat Muinuddin, president of Women's Intercultural Network.

רעדאגירט פון ש. ליפשיץ

פורים, דער פריילעכער און פאלקסטימלעכער יום-טוב

פון מאניע ליפשיץ

פורים ווערט געפראָוועט פון אַלע יידן איבער דער גאַנצער וועלט, און כמעט אין אַלע לענדער פֿראָוועט מען דעם יום-טוב אויף זעלבן שטיגער. אומעטום ווערט דער יום-טוב באַגלייט מיט פּריידּ, געזאַנג, מיט לאַזן זיך וואוילגיין, און מיט ספּעציעלער פּריידּ און הנאה בּיי די קינדער. אויך די צוגריייטונגען צום פורים ווערן באַגלייט מיט פּונקט אַזויפיל פּריידּ און לוסטיקייט ווי דער יום-טוב גופא.

עס דערמאָנט זיך, ווי פורים פלעגט געפראָוועט ווערן אין דער אַלטער היים. דער טאָג ערב פורים איז אסתר תענית, אַבער דאָס איז אייגנער פון די תעניתים, וואָס בלויז געצילטע האָבן אָפּגעהיטן.

אין אונזט פון דעם דיימענטן אָדר האָט זיך אַנגעהויבן דער פורים יום-טוב. דעם אונזט זיינען אַלע זיך צוזאַמענגעקומען אין בית-מדרש. פריער האָט מען געדאָונט מעריב און דערנאָך האָט מען געליינט די מגילה. די קינדער פלעגן שטיין גריייטע מיט די גראַגערס און ווי נאָר המנ'ס נאָמען איז דערמאָנט געוואָרן, האָבן די קינדער אָנגעהויבן דריייען מיט די גראַגערס, קלאַפּן מיט די קלאַפּערס און אַנמאַכן אַזאַ מורא'דיקן טומל, אַז מען האָט דאָס ליידער ניט געקאָנט הערן. די עלטערע יידן פלעגן שרייען אויף די קינדער, אַבער די קינדער האָבן זיי געהערט ווי „המן דעם גראַגער".

ניט אַלע מאָל האָט מען געוווּצט אַ גראַגער. אַמאָליקע צייטן פלעגט מען פאַרברענגען המנ'ס טשוטשעלע. אט-דער מנהג איז געבליבן בלויז בּיי די פערסישע יידן. דער מנהג שטאַמט פון די צייטן, וועו פורים איז געווען דער יום-טוב ביים אָפּשלוס פון ווי-טער און ביים אָנהויב פון פרילינג, און מ'פלעגט פאַרברענען אַ טשוטשעלע, כדי צו פאַרטרייבן די בייזע רוחות. אין פּינסק יאָר-הונדערט האָט אט-דער מנהג זיך אָנגענומען אויף דער קעגנער-שאַפט פון קריסטן. עס איז פאַרשפּרייט געוואָרן אַ בּלבּול, אַז יידן פאַרברענען יעזוסן אום פורים, און דאָס האָט אפט געפּירט צו אַטאַקעס אויף יידן. מיט דער צייט איז דעריבער דער מנהג פאַר-שוואונדן איך אַלע לענדער פון דער קריסטלעכער וועלט.

אַן אַנדער אופן פון שלאָגן המנ'ען פלעגט זיין אָנצושרייבן דאָס וואָרט המן אויפן זויל פון שוך און דערנאָך קלאַפּן מיטן פוס יעדעס מאָל, וואָס המנ'ס נאָמען איז דערמאָנט געוואָרן בּיים ליי-נען די מגילה.

פורים אינדערפרי האָט מען וויידער געליינט די מגילה, אַבער איצט זיינען שוין ניט געווען אַזויפיל קינדער אין שול.

שיקן שלח-מנות און קריגן שלח-מנות איז איינער פון די פּיי-סטע מנהגים פון דעם יום-טוב. מ'שיקט שלח-מנות צו משפּחה, קרובים, צו גוטע פריינד און צו נויטבאַדערפטיקע.

כאָטש פורים איז נישט געפראָוועט געוואָרן ווי אַלע אַנדערע רעליגיעזע יום-טובים מיט פיל רעליגיעזע צערעמאָניעס און מען האָט געארבעט, איז דאָך אין דער היים די שטימונג געווען אַ יום-טוב'דיקע. אויפן טיש זיינען געווען גוטע גרייט צובייסנס, אַ שנעפּסל, אַ ביסל ווין, קיכלעך און המן-טאַשן. אין אונזט האָט מען געפראָוועט אַ פורים סעודה, צו וועלכער עס איז זיך צוזאַמענגעקו-מען די משפּחה און גוטע פריינד.

בּיי דער פורים סעודה האָט מען דערוואָרט די פורים שפּילער, חוץ דעם וואָס מען האָט געוווּנדערן לידער און בכלל זיך משמח גע-ווען. די פורים שפּילער זיינען געווען מערסטנס יידן און בחורים פון דעם אייגענעם שטעטל, מערסטנס אַרבעטער חברה, וועלכע פלעגן זיך אָנטאָן אין קאָסטיומען מיט מאָסקעס און אויפפירן די פורים-מעשה מיט אסתר'ן און המנ'ען.

אַמשטאַרקסטן האָבן די קינדער הנאה געהאַט פון די פורים-שפּילער. זיי פלעגן מיטלויפן מיט די שפּילער פון הויז צו הויז, מיטגיין מיט זיי אַהיים, זיי שטאַרק מקנא זיין און זיך פילן גליקלעך וועו די שפּילער האָבן זיי צוגעלאָזט נאָענט צו זיך.

פון אָט-די פורים-שפּילער און פורים-שפּילן האָט זיך ביסלעכ-ווייז אָנגעהויבן אַנטוויקלען דאָס יידישע טעאַטער (אין 16-טן יאָרהונדערט).

Nazi hunter gets stopped at Canadian border

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Efraim Zuroff, a recent visit to Canada held more than its share of irony.

Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Israel office, was stopped by Immigration authorities when he arrived in Toronto recently to deliver a lecture on Nazi war criminals.

Before being released, he was questioned closely about the lecture and about any fee he'd receive for it.

"If they had shown the same concern about Nazis, I wouldn't be talking about it today," he later exclaimed.

Zuroff, author of Occupation: Nazi Hunter, was permitted into Canada, where he delivered his talk to about 70 guests at the home of Lorri Kushnir.

His message to them was simple: keep the pressure on the Canadian government to ensure they treat the issue of Nazi war criminals as a priority. Canadians must follow up the momentum created by U.S. private investigator Steven Rambam, who located 157 Nazi collaborators virtually on his own and interviewed 62, Zuroff said.

For Zuroff, Rambam's investigation and the publicity it generated in the United States and Canada marks a watershed event.

"In the wake of Rambam, there isn't a person in Canada who doesn't know there are Nazis here," Zuroff said.

Rambam's great contribution in the search for justice for war criminals was to take the issue and make it comprehensible to the average Canadian. "He personalized it to the level of a Jew seeking justice," Zuroff suggested.

A key element in that endeavor was publicizing the transcript from his interview with Antanas Kenstavicius, former deputy police chief in Svencionya, Lithuania. Kenstavicius, who lived in Hope, B.C., was one of 10 alleged Nazi war criminals federal authorities are seeking to deport for lying about their wartime activities. Kenstavicius died on the first day of hearings but before he did, he granted Rambam an interview — ostensibly about police/military cooperation during wartime.

Efraim Zuroff

Kenstavicius described being present at a killing site in Lithuania where thousands of Jews were shot. "When he described the murder of the last Jew and said, 'Finished, no more Jews,' it was chilling, absolutely chilling. It sent a shiver down your spine," Zuroff said.

Not only did Rambam's exploits capture the imagination of Canadians, it did the same in the United States. An audience of millions learned on CBS' 60 Minutes and Dateline NBC of Canada's sorry record of turning a blind eye to war criminals. Vanity Fair magazine, a widely-read U.S. publication, is also preparing an item on war criminals with a special focus on Rambam's work, Zuroff added.

Continuing his analysis, Zuroff suggested that by capturing the imagination of the public and the media, Rambam "energized" the Jewish community. Not only must community organizations continue to push for further deportations, the public must get involved by writing to their MPs "urging the government to take action," he said.

Historically, the Canadian government, fearing inter-ethnic tensions, hoped the "issue would go away." While Justice Minister Allan Rock seems committed to deporting war criminals, a key question that remains is whether that view is accepted by the middle echelons of the Justice Department bureaucracy, he said.

Turning to developments elsewhere, Zuroff said an international effort is underway to protest the continued presence in Costa Rica of Bogdan Koziy, a notorious war criminal. A former member of the security police in wartime Ukraine, Koziy personally murdered 14 people, including a 3-year-old Jewish girl in the village of Lysiec. He was stripped of his U.S. citizenship before fleeing to the Latin American nation.

"I don't think he should have the privilege of living in a place like Costa Rica," said Zuroff, noting that Koziy is receiving support from the local Roman Catholic Church.

In Britain, authorities are actively investigating five suspects with a view to laying criminal charges, while in Australia, there is a push to convince authorities to adopt the denaturalization/deportation track after the failure of criminal prosecutions.

Turning to Lithuania, Zuroff said he is urging the government there to charge Alexandras Lileikis with war crimes. Lileikis returned to the Baltic nation after being stripped of his U.S. citizenship in June 1996. Despite assurances by the president of Lithuania that war criminals would be prosecuted and despite a letter of protest from 92 Israel parliamentarians, nothing has been done about Lileikis or other suspects, Zuroff said.

On the contrary. Five Lithuanian Nazis, three of them from the notorious 12th Battalion, a killing squad, have left the United States and found sanctuary in Lithuania, he said.

Droege nabbed taking car

TORONTO — Wolfgang Droege, founder of the white supremacist Heritage Front, was arrested last week for possession of a stolen vehicle.

Droege, 47, and Balwinder Singh Dhaliwal were arrested at an airport hotel after police received a tip. A Jeep Cherokee and a Dodge Caravan were seized.

Droege and Dhaliwal are charged with possessing stolen goods worth more than $5,000. They were released and ordered to appear in court in April.

Ethnomusicologist explores crypto-Jewish traditions

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Simply put, this-year-in-Belmonte is Judith Cohen's wish for Passover.

Since last summer, the Montreal-born ethnomusicologist/medievalist has been to the Portuguese mountain village three times as part of a research project focusing on musical traditions in crypto-Jewish areas of Spain and Portugal.

Because Passover is one of the few Jewish holidays observed by crypto-Jews (descendants of forcibly converted Jews who have secretly maintained Jewish traditions), Cohen, 47, would like to take one of the Belmonte residents up on an invitation extended last fall.

How soon she returns depends on funding. Although her one-year York University research grant ends this month, the project itself — an extension of Cohen's longtime work with Sephardi music — isn't over.

An expert on Judeo-Spanish music in Canada (the subject of her 1989 doctoral dissertation), Cohen teaches at York University and is known outside the academic world as a performer.

A founder and the only non-Sephardi member of Gerineldo, a Moroccan Judeo-Spanish ensemble, Cohen will take part in a medieval concert at Hart House on April 17.

As a researcher, she believes now is the time to study crypto-Jewish traditions. In Belmonte, for example, Marrano customs are being replaced to a significant extent by mainstream Jewish practices among those who have formally converted to Judaism. Of about 4,000 residents of the town, perhaps 150 are Jewish or Marrano (the term they themselves use).

Yet even in Belmonte, where many have "come out" as Jews, local Marranos are circumspect about their background.

In smaller Spanish and Portuguese border communities, Cohen found people even more reluctant to admit to Jewish ancestry. "They've spent so many centuries being careful about what they say and who they say it to that it's really built in."

Last summer, Cohen — accompanied by José-Ramón Aparicio, her Spanish research assistant, and 10-year-old daughter Tamar – set out in a beat-up old car to interview residents of some three dozen Spanish and Portuguese towns over a period of three months. They are in the process of transcribing and interpreting a total of 30 hours of audiotape and 10 of video, some gleaned on a second trip this winter.

One of the early results of her study shows reported preferences of crypto-Jews for lyrical, romantic stringed music.

While Cohen found the Belmonte community "nice but kind of suspicious" on her initial visit, she encountered a much warmer reception on her return.

"You realize you have a responsibility. You have to sort out what your responsibilities are to them and to the music. I'd like to publish something ethnomusicologically sound that doesn't compromise them in any way. I'd like to have their traditions preserved, ideally in humidity-controlled archives."

Cohen recently led a series of colloquia for graduate students on Fieldwork Ethics related to her work of the past year. Although ethical issues are important in any kind of research, they tend to be magnified when one is working with crypto-Jewish communities, she noted.

With the advent of electronic recording equipment, particularly small tape recorders, ethnomusicological issues have shifted from authenticity to questions regarding consent.

By and large, Sephardi Jews she has recorded have been happy to contribute and be credited. "But...there are people who don't want their names mentioned or their photos taken – crypto-Jews specifically but [not exclusively]. In some cases, even if you just mention the village, everyone knows who you're talking about."

Cohen's familiarity with local musical traditions has proven to be a boon. "It's helpful to be able to say, 'Do you know this one?' and sing it reasonably well. Then someone answers, 'It doesn't go like this; it goes like this.'

"That's music to your ears — literally."

She'arim dedicates program to the late Judith Dan

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Arts Integrated Program of the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School was dedicated last week to the memory of artist Judith Dan.

Dan, who died in 1995, was the wife of philanthropist Leslie Dan, founder of Novopharm Inc. After the couple was honored by She'arim for their charitable work, she became interested in the school, particularly its arts program.

The integrated arts program is a way of using art, music, drama and movement to teach skills. It is particularly useful at She'arim, a school for children with learning disabilities, since many traditional teaching techniques are not effective with these children.

Judy Leitner Spetter, who created the program, told a gathering at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue that Dan "shared the same basic beliefs as teachers do: that children learn best in a creative environment, that you can foster the development of learning skills through music, drama, art, and movement, and that some of the best art can be made from recycled stuff!"

Dan wandered into an arts class during a tour of the school, Spetter recalled, and just sat down and joined the children in untangling telephone wire, which they were using as sculptures. She later helped scrounge supplies for the school, including looms and weaving fabrics.

She called Dan "a great friend, a supporter, and an inspiration."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth and a founder of the school, said that "we honor Judith Dan's memory because she was a special person. She had the ability, the desire and the inspiration to use her G-d given talent."

Board of Jewish Education executive director Rabbi Irwin Witty, another co-founder of She'arim, said that the nachas the school gave its organizers over the years made the effort worthwhile.

From coast to coast

Bleyer headed Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre

MONTREAL — Stephen Bleyer, who spent his youth in Auschwitz and devoted his later years to speaking to students about the dangers of prejudice, died recently at the age of 65.

Bleyer had been president of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) since 1994, and previously had been chair of its speakers' committee, which coordinated visits of Holocaust survivors to schools, universities and community organizations.

"Stephen Bleyer was an articulate spokesperson for the MHMC. During his mandate, outreach to the general community increased by over 500 percent," said Bill Surkis, MHMC executive director.

Bleyer frequently travelled well beyond Montreal, to Drummondville and Victoriaville, for example, to talk to students, and also guided visiting young people through the MHMC's museum.

He played a key role in a nationally-televised commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. He spoke of his commitment to countering anti-Semitism and prejudice generally by exposing the consequences of hatred and teaching appreciation of social justice.

Bleyer, an architect by profession, was born in the small town of Komadi, Hungary, in 1931. In the summer of 1944, at age 13, he, his brother Frank, parents and both sets of grandparents, were among some 70 Jewish families transported in railway freight cars to Auschwitz.

When Auschwitz was liberated on Jan. 27, 1945, Bleyer and his brother were the only survivors among his immediate family.

Bleyer returned to his hometown after the war, but fled after the Communists took power in Hungary, first going to Italy and later settling in Montreal.

He began his studies in architecture in Turin and graduated from McGill University in 1956. He was a founding partner of the firm Bleyer, Soucy and Wiseman Architects, and won a number of architectural prizes, including the BOMA Award for the best designed suburban office building in 1995.

Bleyer served on the building committee of the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital and was a vice-president of the Visual Arts Centre.

"Stephen Bleyer personified the good in man," Surkis said. "His courage in the face of the unspeakable taught the meaning of respect, honor and humility. His leadership stands as a model of unconditional commitment and vision."

Bleyer is survived by his wife Hilda and son Peter (Mandy) and daughter Lisa (Miles). Donations may be made to the Stephen Bleyer Memorial Fund, c/o the MHMC.

Hamilton JNF launches campaign

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Jewish National Fund (JNF) launched its local 1997 campaign recently with a reception at the Hamilton Art Gallery to introduce this year's Negev Dinner honoree, Hamilton Mayor Bob Morrow.

Dinner chair Marvin Rosenshein said Morrow has, throughout his career, shown an outstanding commitment not only to Hamilton, but also to its Jewish community.

Born in Hamilton in 1946, Morrow is the city's longest-serving mayor. He was first elected alderman in 1971, then served as controller and as deputy mayor from 1976 to 1980. He was first elected mayor in 1981.

The mayor also said that together with JNF co-president Claire Waxman, he is engaged in negotiations to twin Hamilton with a city in Israel. Waxman has already twinned Hamilton with nine other cities around the world, including Afula in Israel with the neighboring town of Dundas.

This year's Negev Dinner will take place on June 25. Proceeds will go towards Action Negev, JNF emissary, Brig. Gen Dubi Dekel announced.

Kosher 'tax' denied

OTTAWA — National Revenue Minister Jane Stewart last week expressed concern that a hate group is saying Canadians pay a "hidden tax" on kosher foods and goods.
